THE HONOURABLE MARTIAL ASSELIN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS TO SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE ON ELECTION AS PRESIDENT OF L'ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE DES PARLEMENTAIRES DE LANGUE FRANÇAISE

Hon. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, today I would like to congratulate the Speaker pro tempore of the Senate on his election as president of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: I had the privilege of being with him in Cameroon when he was elected, and I believe he still is head of the Canadian delegation. We could not have hoped for a better choice, and our Speaker pro tempore is well known in Franco-phone parliamentary circles throughout the world. I am sure he will be a credit to us.

I am sure you will all agree that this is indeed an honour for the Senate and Senator Asselin.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am of course delighted to join Senator Thériault in congratulating our Speaker pro tempore and president of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française.

Unfortunately, I was not present when the election took place. However, on many other occasions I was able to witness the role played by Senator Asselin within the association and his contribution to its policies.

The fact that a member of the Canadian Senate was elected president of the association and that his predecessor was from the African continent has special significance.

If I am not mistaken, it is the first time that a Canadian or even a North American—the association includes members from North America who are not from Canada—was elected president. This fact is very significant and it reflects the role played by Canada on the international scene among French-speaking countries, a role similar to the one it had started to play in the Commonwealth. In the case of the international “Francophonie”, however, this role is becoming quite substantial. The fact that Senator Asselin is now president of the association would seem to reinforce that view.

It is with great pride that I join Senator Thériault, on behalf of my colleagues, in extending our congratulations to Senator Asselin.

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to add my comments to those made by Senators Thériault and Tremblay. Those among us who have had the pleasure of working with Senator Asselin realize that this decision reflects the recognition that non-Canadian members of the AIPLF have for his work and we can only rejoice in that decision.

As Senator Tremblay pointed out, I think it is the first time in many years that the AIPLF elected a president from a country outside the African continent. I think that for Canada this is particularly significant, and that for us it is particularly significant that Senator Asselin was chosen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senators Thériault, Tremblay and Molgat for their kind words.

The reason the delegates decided to elect me president of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française was mainly their desire to recognize the major role played by Canada today within the international “Francophonie”, as was pointed out by Senator Tremblay.

I accept this tribute with great humility. I may add that in Cameroon, at the time of my election, I headed a Canadian delegation that was a credit to this country.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE OF NAME—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS REFERRED TO STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the following message had been received:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Friday, December 18, 1987

ORDERED,—That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the purpose of altering the name of the present Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to the Standing Joint Committee for Regulatory Scrutiny.

ATTEST

Robert Marleau
The Clerk of the House of Commons.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Doody, message referred to Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

PRINCE RUPERT GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-106, to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations at the Port of Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. William Kelly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, this bill requires an immediate return to work by the 69 striking workers employed by Prince Rupert Grain Limited at its grain elevator at Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

Prince Rupert Grain Limited is a consortium of the six largest grain handling companies in western Canada. These companies came together in 1979 to build a state-of-the-art facility at Prince Rupert. This was in response to a study by the Canadian Wheat Board that forecast a shortfall in grain handling capacity.

With your permission, honourable senators, I would like to go through the chronology of the major events that have led up to this bill and the major points that are at issue. I will be brief, because the full chronological road has many twists and turns. This is not a straightforward or routine matter.

The origins of the current dispute reach back to December 1984 when Prince Rupert Grain Limited closed one of its terminals at Prince Rupert (PRG-1) and opened another (PRG-2) on Ridley Island. PRG-1 had been government-owned until it was privatized in 1980. Employees were given the option to move to the new union, Local 333 of the Grain Workers' Union, or be transferred within the Public Service Union.

PRG-2 is Canada's newest and most technologically advanced grain handling facility. It became evident that the move from PRG-1 to PRG-2, and a major shortfall in the anticipated volume of grain to be moved, would result in the displacement of some workers and the reorganization of some job categories.

In particular, there was the question of who—unionized employees or supervisors—would man the so-called "Grain Centre", the central computer facility that monitors and controls virtually all the operations at PRG-2. Consequently, the union representing the employees held that the commencement of operations at PRG-2 constituted a technological change under the Canada Labour Code. What this meant was if it were found that technological change had in fact occurred, the collective agreement would be opened up to allow parties to negotiate whatever transitional arrangements might be required. In this case, of course, the collective agreement was already open.

Parallel to this particular dispute there was also a wider dispute involving the British Columbia Terminal Elevators' Association and the Grain Workers' Union. This wider dispute was settled in May 1985. By informal arrangement this general agreement was applied to PRG-2, leaving only the transitional issues peculiar to PRG-2 in dispute.

From the period February 1985 through to today a number of initiatives were taken to try to resolve the issues in dispute at PRG-2. In February 1985 Conciliation Commissioner Vince Ready was appointed. He reported on the PRG-2 issues in January 1986, but the report was rejected by the union.

In March 1986 Mike Collins was appointed as mediator, under section 195 of the Canada Labour Code, but no agreement could be reached between the parties.

Meanwhile, the union pursued its efforts through the Canada Labour Relations Board and the Federal Court of Appeal to have the scope of its bargaining unit expanded to cover PRG-2. These efforts also ultimately proved unsuccessful.

Negotiations between the parties continued intermittently between April 1986 and November 1987, with neither party showing any willingness to compromise on the fundamental issues.

On December 9, 1987, the union commenced strike action. Six days later the Minister of Labour instructed mediator J.M. Collins to reconvene the parties once again. However, by early January these discussions had reached an impasse.

On January 7 the Minister of Labour sent a telegram to the parties asking that they come to Ottawa to meet with Associate Deputy Minister Bill Kelly.

I might say at this point that there is no relationship between myself and that Bill Kelly, although I receive many congratulatory messages and telephone calls telling me what a great job I do on labour mediation. I have long since ceased to deny that I am that Bill Kelly. I simply thank those people for their comments and their compliments. As long as Mr. Kelly continues in his present role I suppose I will continue to get these messages. I enjoy them thoroughly.

Mediation sessions under Kelly began on January 11, but it quickly became clear to him that neither side was prepared to compromise. He therefore made a formal proposal to the parties that would have, if accepted, resolved the dispute and ensured the immediate resumption of operations at PRG-2.

The major elements of Kelly's proposal were as follows: one, that the parties implement formally the terms of the agreement now in effect for the Vancouver Grain Terminals under the collective agreement negotiated in 1985, and, two, that the parties submit the outstanding differences with respect to job classifications, et cetera, to an arbitrator for final and binding determination.

It was the second element that proved to be the sticking point. It was acceptable to the union only if a specific individual—Justice Emmett Hall—was appointed as the arbitrator.

By insisting on the appointment of a particular individual the union was inviting questions about his impartiality and, therefore, the impartiality of the arbitration process.

By making the appointment a condition of acceptance the union was creating a precedent that would have undermined the quasi-judicial arbitration process not only for this dispute but perhaps for future disputes.

The company refused to submit to binding arbitration on matters it sees as being "one of the few remaining rights of management in most collective agreements."

Honourable senators, I am sure we all wish that the parties to this dispute could be left to work out a solution. However, I understand from those who have been directly involved in trying to reach a solution that there is no end in sight to the dispute and to the recalcitrance of the two parties. More importantly, there are innocent third parties whose interests are at stake and who could sustain irreparable harm, namely, western grain producers who cannot get their grain to international markets. We must also consider its effects on the overseas reputation of Canada as a reliable source of export grain at a time when we are trying to compete in an increasingly competitive and fluid international grain market; and the Canadian economy for which this work stoppage constitutes an unacceptable cost.

In that regard, let me quote from the Bairstow Report of 1978, which states:

● (1510)

Canada's grain handling system occupies a position of tremendous importance to the Canadian economy. It intimately connects a wide range of economic activity in the primary, secondary and tertiary sectors, encompassing in the process the manufacture of farm implements, supplies and materials; the processing of food products for domestic consumption; and the preparation of a wide variety of grain and grain products for export to some of the world's largest consumer nations. In an industry of this magnitude, the coordination, timing, and efficiency of resource employment are essential to the maintenance of our domestic food supplies and to Canada's reputation as a reliable source of grain exports.

Honourable senators, having given a brief glimpse of the background to this legislation, allow me to review quickly the major provisions of the bill.

In addition to providing for an immediate resumption of terminal operations at PRG-2, the bill requires the parties to incorporate the terms of the agreement between the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators' Association and the Grain Workers' Union in Vancouver into their collective agreement.

This merely formalizes the existing informal arrangement in which the employer has been implementing many changes which have arisen from time to time as a consequence of the Vancouver agreement.

With respect to the issues which caused the impasse in negotiations, the bill calls for the appointment by the Minister of Labour of an arbitrator to make a final and binding determination. A 45-day time limit is established for this process, subject to extension only if both parties to the dispute agree.

Honourable senators, I do not like back-to-work legislation. I do not like governments having to wade into and resolve private sector labour-management disputes. I am sure most honourable senators share my distaste.

However, of greater concern to this Parliament is the public good, and in particular the plight of western farmers who cannot get their grain to market while one of Canada's most modern grain handling facilities lies dormant.

Given the precedence that the public good must take over private interests, and given the resources and time that have already been committed to try to find a solution, I believe that we have no option but to approve this legislation.

Honourable senators, I therefore urge you to give this bill speedy and positive consideration.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Kelly when he says that we regret having this legislation before us today. It is almost becoming a pattern with this government that dispute after dispute goes unsettled and finally Parliament is asked to provide a legislated framework for the settlement of the dispute. I believe that that flies in the face of normal collective bargaining. I, as well as others, regret that the free collective bargaining process has not resulted in a settlement in any of these disputes.

I have interests, I guess, on both sides of this dispute because I am a grain farmer. For some time I had the honour to be responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is essential to the agricultural industry and to farmers that grain be moved on to the world markets. However, I believe that the position that has been taken by the grain handlers' union over a period of some years now—because they have been without a contract now for about four years—has been generally responsible.

When I was a minister I had dealings with this union on behalf of the government, and I can say that I found Mr. Henry Kancs to be a responsible labour leader. I found him to be a labour leader who kept in mind the interests of the grain producers as well as the interests of the workers in his union, and I very much regret that a settlement was not reached through the normal bargaining process.

I think management has taken a rigid position. The workers were prepared to submit to arbitration. It is correct to say that they put forward the name of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall as their choice for an arbitrator, and I do not think that should have cancelled the negotiations towards finding an arbitrator. Certainly, I believe that the union, while that was their first choice, would have been prepared to consider alternative names had they been put forward.

Management has refused to budge on the question of computer operators and has refused to agree that they should be in any way members of the union.

The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable John Turner, issued a press release in which he encouraged the Minister of Labour to meet the two sides in the dispute to try to work out an agreement with regard to an arbitrator. I personally think that that would have been a useful meeting to have undertaken. However, it is clear that the government has taken the position that both parties are to blame.

Yesterday, in the House of Commons, the minister said that these parties have effectively said to the Canadian public, "We don't care about your interests or about collective bargaining." He said, "This attitude is absolutely unacceptable . . . What is unacceptable is that the parties have made up their minds that they are not going to settle their differences through the democratic mechanisms which are provided by our Labour Code."

Honourable senators, it seems to me that it was management who decided that under no circumstances would they agree to arbitration of the issue respecting workers who operate the computers.

I can understand the position taken by the union. The union membership has been reduced from 115 to 64. In terms of computer operators, outside the union the number increased from 6 to 15, a 150 per cent increase. Therefore, the union feels that it has to take a position to protect, if it can, the union membership.

On December 4, 1987, in a press release having to do with the Vancouver situation, Mr. Henry Kanes is quoted as having said:

We knew we had to sign a three-year agreement and settle for less than a five per cent increase over the three years if we were to retain the confidence and support of the producing farmers. Their welfare has to be as much concern to us as our welfare.

• (1520)

In a press release of January 13 the union had this to say:

We are not on strike for money. We recently signed a three-year agreement with the five Vancouver elevators without government intervention. We simply want the same agreement and practices in Prince Rupert. The Company has used the excuse of the introduction of technological change to eliminate 64 of 115 union positions while increasing supervisors from 6 to 15 and contracting out work. At the same time, our productivity in tonnes and tonnes per man is increasing phenomenally.

This dispute is about jobs—union jobs. The sacrifices our members are making on the picket line are not for selfish reasons. It is so union members can share in the future world of computer technology and not become a relic of the past like the grain shovels we once used. We are intelligent enough to participate in the future. We already do it at other elevators.

Honourable senators, I think this is a major issue. Whether the operation of computers in this industry or in other industries is to be exclusively a function of management, and is not to form part of a normal collective bargaining agreement, is a matter of principle. In my judgment, until that particular principle is decided upon we will have more and more strikes and disputes with that as the central issue.

From the standpoint of the grain producers, exports over this period have not been going forward, and they are of a value of $70 million. Nobody can say that the farmers have had taken from them $70 million that they will never recover, because the fact is that the physical grain has not been lost; it has not been destroyed. The physical grain over the last few weeks has not gone to market, and that grain, as I have said, is valued at $70 million.

When I was the minister in charge of the Wheat Board there was a dispute at Thunder Bay which lasted for some two weeks. After the settlement of that dispute, the workers returned to work with enthusiasm. Their productivity was very high, and they succeeded in exporting out of Thunder Bay in 50 weeks the largest quantity of grain in history. This terminal was designed to handle 3.5 million tonnes annually. Last year it handled 4.2 million tonnes. The workers performed well—they performed in such a way that they dealt with 20 per cent over what was stated to be the normal capacity of that terminal.

Honourable senators, I am sure that these workers will return to work and will perform well. I am sure they will get the grain moving. Let us hope for the recovery of a large part if not, perhaps, all of the $70 million worth of grain that over this period of time has not been moving forward to market.

Honourable senators, I think the situation we find ourselves in today is absolutely unnecessary. Management, led by the cooperatives—led by the wheat pools of which I am a strong and consistent supporter—has dug in its heels and has said that it will not submit willingly to arbitration as part of this process. I do not think that the two or three people who occupy the top management positions are really speaking for the 100,000 farmers who are the members of these cooperatives. I think there would be a much greater chance of an amicable settlement of this dispute all round if the farmers themselves took part in the process.

Cooperative management sometimes is no more able to foresee the future than can the management of some private corporations. Management did not see that the fertilizer industry was going to be in trouble. So Western Cooperative Fertilizers has lost many millions of dollars. Today the operation is closed and the company is virtually out of business. CSP Foods, which processes canola, has been in great trouble. It is all part of the downturn in the grain business in this country.

I read in the newspapers that the Canadian Cooperative Credit Society has underwritten Osler Incorporated, one of the brokerage firms which deal on the Toronto Stock Exchange. I only know what I read in the press, and I read that the company has an exposure of $40 million and may incur very heavy losses.

I am saying that management often demonstrates that it is not infallible, whether it be management of large cooperatives or of certain large businesses. In my judgment, in this instance the government, the minister, should have brought the parties together and should have made one more try to have agreement reached between the parties concerning the appointment of an arbitrator. I believe that management has been too rigid in holding to the position that under no circumstances would they agree to arbitration and the appointment of an arbitrator. It seems to me that when two parties are unable to agree, the least they could do is agree voluntarily that a third party should be called in to resolve their differences.

This legislation has received speedy consideration in the other place. I believe the debate occupied less than two hours in total, and I know that the Senate will not hold up the legislation, because it is necessary that the grain should move once again. I regret that the legislation is before us. I believe the union has taken a reasonable position. I was pleased to read the speech of the Liberal critic in the House of Commons, Jacques Guilbault, who, on behalf of the opposition, took a very responsible and balanced point of view on this very difficult question.

The other day I was privileged to meet with Shirley Carr, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, and I found her attitude toward this dispute and to the positions held by the union and the farmers to be reasonable. I know the members of the union and the farmers well. What stood in the way of an agreement was not the attitude of the rank and file cooperative members but the attitude of management, which said that under no circumstances would employees operating computers be part of the collective bargaining agreement.

The challenge for Canada in the future will be to have a system that will allow for free collective bargaining and for unions to represent a very large proportion of the employees in those industries with which they are associated, and this to include computer operators.

• (1530)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the background and history leading up to the situation where the government felt it necessary to bring in back-to-work legislation—namely, Bill C-106—has been reasonably well described by Senator Kelly and reviewed by Senator Argue, so I shall not go into that part of the problem. I expect that the Minister of Labour, or at least some of his officials, will be here to answer questions. I have not been informed as to whether or not we are going into Committee of the Whole, but I take it from the nodding heads I see that that is probably the next stage.

Honourable senators, I have one or two questions I would like to ask now so that the officials can be prepared to answer them when they get here. Bill C-106 is reasonably standard back-to-work legislation, which we have seen a number of times. In fact, some people have mentioned that we have seen it far too often. The bill contains the penalties, and so on, for non-compliance by labour union officials and provides for prevention of lock-outs, and that sort of thing. However, one clause in the bill is very different, and that is subclause 5(2). Subclause 5(1) extends the collective agreement for a specified period, to December 31, 1989, which is fairly standard procedure. However, subclause 5(2) reads in part:

—the collective agreement shall be deemed to be amended by the incorporation therein of the terms and conditions of the collective agreement between the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators' Association and the union and in effect for the period—

And it goes on to describe the period. It amends the agreement that is to be extended to the Prince Rupert Terminal by something that is included in the agreement that is applicable to the Vancouver Terminal. Senator Kelly referred to this matter more than once, but he did not describe exactly what would be included in this agreement.

As I understand the dispute, it is over who will run the computers in Prince Rupert. This is an important issue in this particular terminal, because, as has been described, it is the most modern grain terminal in Canada and perhaps in the world. It has a lot of modern, sophisticated machinery that is managed or controlled by computers, which is a phenomenon that is happening in a lot of industries. The legislation does not say whether or not it is this aspect of computers in the agreement for Vancouver that will be brought into the union-management agreement for Prince Rupert. Who will run the computers? Will it be the supervisors and management or will it be members of the labour union? That is a question I would like answered. Senator Kelly tried to indicate that this aspect was, in the view of the government, or in the view of the Minister of Labour, a reasonable amendment to the agreement. However, I have read with some interest the press reports from time to time and I have not seen anything that would indicate to me that the agreement between the union and management at the Vancouver Terminal is such that it deals with all the advanced and advancing technology, if I may put it that way. I hope that in closing the debate Senator Kelly will tell us whether it is this aspect of the agreement in Vancouver that is being included in the Prince Rupert agreement to make it acceptable.

That is my main question. I have a number of other questions with respect to ongoing amendments to the Labour Code so that such matters can be dealt with in the future. I did not hear the sponsor of the bill give any indication as to what the government intends to do with respect to this matter, but obviously they have run up against a problem. Management says that there is no way they will allow the labour union to run this part of the plant. Yet, the computer operators are, in fact, providing the human element of the service that was previously provided by labour union members. So there is some justification for the union's stance, even though the operation at the terminal has moved to a higher stage of technology.

I shall not repeat the figures with regard to the decrease in the number of labour union members required to operate that terminal and the tonnage per worker, which, of course, has gone up tremendously, even though I have them here. This terminal is far larger than the old PRG No.1 Terminal, and that is clear. The output at the Prince Rupert Terminal is far more than two or three times the amount dealt with at this old terminal. Of course, labour union members are concerned about what the new rules will be in the application of advanced technology. I refer not only to the members at this terminal but to the members at other terminals as they face the situation of what happens after modern machinery and technology is installed.

I have heard no discussion on the guidelines for the arbitrator. Is the government simply going to turn the matter over to an arbitrator with, or perhaps without, some recommendations?

The bill calls for binding third-party arbitration. It seems to me that there ought to be in the bill some guidelines within which the arbitrator's recommendations will be binding. Perhaps Senator Kelly, or whoever will be here from the Labour Department, would like to deal with that question as well.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I would like to comment on a couple of matters, but before I do I wish to confirm that the minister and some of his officials are here, and I shall be moving that we consider the bill in Committee of the Whole.

I would like to comment on one item raised by an honourable senator from across the way, and that is the question of the naming of a proposed arbitrator. The union has suggested that Mr. Justice Emmett Hall act as arbitrator. I did not mean to imply in my earlier remarks that Mr. Justice Hall would not be an impartial arbitrator; rather, I was referring to the need for arbitration processes to be seen to be impartial. While I am certain that Mr. Justice Emmett Hall would have been impartial, it would be hard to expect the other party to the dispute to feel the same way. For the success of arbitration of this sort I think it must be seen and felt to be totally impartial. I was not trying to be critical in any way.

On the question of the Vancouver agreement affecting the agreement at Prince Rupert, I am sure that a full answer will be provided by the officials. My understanding is that certain common issues are involved. Since the same union was negotiating, and since certain issues were common to Vancouver and Prince Rupert, there was an informal understanding and, in fact, an agreement that where some of those matters that were common had been settled at Vancouver, that settlement would apply equally to Prince Rupert. In other words, it simply formalized what has been an informal understanding and what has, in fact, been taking place. At least, that is my understanding.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, I do not have any comment to make on the general question of who should be managing a computer centre. That is clearly something on which there will probably be as many views as there are people thinking about it. However, again I think the minister and his officials can answer that question more effectively and fully than I can.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William Kelly: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that this bill be now referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle in the Chair.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, with leave, I would like to ask that the Honourable Pierre Cadieux, Minister of Labour, be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole, and that he be accompanied by his Associate Deputy Minister, Mr. Bill Kelly.

The Chairman: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the rules of the Senate, the Honourable Pierre H. Cadieux, Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, once again I welcome to this chamber the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Pierre Cadieux. As I have already said, he is accompanied by his Associate Deputy Minister, Mr. Bill Kelly. I am sure the minister would be pleased to answer any questions that senators might have on this piece of legislation.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before commencing with the minister's statement I would like to welcome all honourable senators back to this distinguished chamber. That welcome includes the minister and his associate. I also hope that everyone will enjoy a very good year.

Honourable senators, it is my intention to take the names of those senators who wish to speak and, in rotation, they will be given the chance to ask their questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Minister, it is your turn to speak.

[English]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux, Minister of Labour: Honourable senators, first of all, permit me to wish you a happy New Year. I did not think I would be here so soon in the new year dealing with such a matter once again. If there is anything that I agree with in Senator Argue's speech it is the fact that we do not like this type of legislation. I think that is the one point on which we all agree one hundred per cent.

Unfortunately, however, circumstances have given me no other option but to introduce this particular bill in the House of Commons. It was passed speedily yesterday with the cooperation of all three parties, and therefore I am here today at your disposal to answer any questions.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, as I said earlier, we regret that the minister has felt it necessary to appear before us so frequently. Perhaps if we were picking a minister on the basis of cordiality and friendliness, we would probably pick you. However, we regret the basis on which you appear before us today.

You have with you your Associate Deputy Minister, Bill Kelly—another William Kelly. I can understand the mix-up, because my vision is not so good and the two Mr. Kellys look somewhat alike. I hope that Senator William Kelly will be very active in this chamber in the days and months ahead. Also, I hope that the distinguished Associate Deputy Minister of Labour, Bill Kelly, will not find it necessary to come back here again for a long, long time. Further, I hope that any projects he undertakes in the future to knock heads together and to bring management and union together in agreement will be successful.

In my long, rambling statement I made the point that there is a very fundamental principle involved here. Years ago Chief Justice Rand made a very important determination on union rights with regard to check-offs, and I am sure the minister is familiar with that fact. This matter is not before a court but it is before an arbitrator, and, as with everything else, it will create a precedent. I hope that in this matter the country will be fortunate enough to have an arbitrator of such a calibre that he will bring in an enlightened solution to this dispute which will set a precedent for the future so that the union's collective agreement will cover large areas within any industry, including support for the principle that trade unionists are quite capable of receiving training and of functioning as supervisors or computer operators.

Further, if it is the government's intention to go in the general direction that the country seems to be taking, and if the arbitrator—whoever he may be—also goes in that direction, the result will be that a substantial and growing percentage of employees will be outside the normal collective bargaining agreements as technology improves, and that will be bad for labour relations in the future. It will also be bad for industrial productivity and bad for Canada. That is my conviction, but as I say that I am wishing you well; I am not ill-wishing you. Let me just say that I hope you, Mr. Minister, will have the judgment of a Solomon in your efforts to appoint an arbitrator who will bring forward a solution that will make a contribution to industrial peace and increase productivity in this country. I think one of the greatest ways to increase productivity is to have a union membership that is happy and satisfied and has a high morale.

I would now like to ask the minister specifically, when you are attempting to arrive at the name of an arbitrator, will you be discussing that name with the two parties involved? Further, will you be asking those parties to attempt to reach an agreement by themselves? It may look impossible at this stage, but it might be a good thing if they gave it another chance.

I ask you further, will you be meeting with them and endeavouring to reach as much agreement as possible? Then perhaps you would explain to us how you see the problem and how you intend to deal with it.

Mr. Cadieux: Senator Argue, I would like to thank you for your kind remarks with regard to my cordiality. I suppose any means that results in that sort of reputation is good. However, I would have preferred another means for you to come to that conclusion. If my five or six appearances here have contributed to your conclusion, then that is the positive side.

I would like to comment very briefly on one of your comments with respect to good labour relations. You are absolutely right—as other senators have mentioned—that through legislation a means may be found to settle an issue. Unfortunately, by that means good working relations are not necessarily established between the parties.

In my opinion, in this particular dispute the parties were given all the opportunities that are afforded in our collective bargaining system under the Canada Labour Code. Unfortunately, the parties—and one party in particular, that being management—refused the concept of arbitration. Their reason for that refusal was that the issues are within the scope of management. I regret that management came to that conclusion, because I believe that if they had accepted the concept of arbitration, as the union did, presumably an arbitration could have been found who would have satisfied both parties. They could then have proceeded with voluntary arbitration.

Because of the firm positions taken I had no other choice but to move with this particular legislation, which imposes a solution that could have been voluntarily accepted.

With respect to the choice of arbitrator, that question was raised yesterday in the other place. At that time I made a commitment that there would be consultation with the parties, as there was consultation with the parties for the appointment of an arbitrator with respect to Bill C-85, the railway bill.

Senator Argue: Could you elaborate a little more? Are you going to consult with the parties? Are you going to try to get them to agree on an arbitrator? Is that the reason to consult with them? Will you ask them for their suggestions? Will you be taking suggestions to them yourself? Do you want to settle it all in one meeting? Are you prepared to meet with the parties from time to time if you can make some progress towards getting an arbitrator in place?

Mr. Cadieux: As I indicated in the House of Commons yesterday, suggestions will be accepted from the parties, as was the case in the railway legislation. We will be asking each party to submit a list of names of potential arbitrators. I will make my decision once I receive those suggestions, bearing in mind that I may have my own suggestions. Perhaps my suggestions will coincide with theirs.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe the minister was in the gallery when I asked what clauses are being brought into this agreement from the collective agreement in Vancouver. As the minister knows, that refers to clause 5.

Clause 7 says that all matters relating to staffing will be sent to the arbitrator for his recommendations, and I presume once the arbitrator has made those recommendations they will be binding. Does that mean that the question in dispute is, who decides how the plant is going to be managed? Up to this point in time management have said that the question of who will operate the computers is a decision of management. The union, of course, for all kinds of reasons—including a decline in the number of workers in the plant—say that they ought to have something to say about that.

There is no clause in the Vancouver agreement that deals with the distribution of positions, particularly the positions relating to the operating of computers. There must be another part of the Vancouver agreement, then, that would have to be incorporated into this agreement in order to amend the period that is outlined in clause 5.

Mr. Cadieux: The main issue in dispute—and I am not saying that this is the only issue in dispute—is the one that is commonly known as manning of the grain centre. In clause 7 the word “staffing” appears rather than the word “manning”, because the Department of Justice suggested that the word “manning” is a sexist expression. Consequently, we had to use a non-sexist word. As one of the Bill Kellys mentioned to me the other day, on ships, if a disaster occurs, we will not say, “Let’s man the boats,” but we will have to say, “Let’s staff the boats.”

The staffing issue relates to the number of union members who will be working in a particular grain centre. On all the other issues the parties agree with the Vancouver collective agreement, and in fact they want those terms and conditions to apply to them. The only exception is the staffing issue, which was not resolved in that other agreement and which obviously was not resolved during the lengthy negotiations that occurred here. As you are aware, they have been negotiating the various stages of the process for close to four years, including some appearances before the CLRB and the Federal Court of Appeal of Canada.

The position of management is based on a CLRB decision, which has, unfortunately, been misinterpreted. That CLRB decision dealt with inclusion or exclusion of foremen in the bargaining unit, which is not the question of manning or staffing that we are dealing with right now. Notwithstanding the fact that management was informed of that misinterpretation on their part, they still refused to go ahead with voluntary arbitration, notwithstanding the suggestion that was apparently made by the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition that I try to get them to agree on an arbitrator.

Senator Olson: Thank you for that information.

When you talk about staffing, that is clearly the designation of positions by management, either as a supervisory position or a union position, or is there more involved than that?

Mr. Cadieux: Staffing is strictly the number of people who are working in a particular grain centre.

Senator Olson: Is it then possible for management to designate certain positions, wherever they may be—and in this case obviously it is in the room where the computer controls are located—as management positions? I understand we can talk about the issue of the number of members in the union, but the designation of positions is important to both sides. It is particularly important to management, because they have said over and over again—or at least the press has reported—that they are going to decide how to manage the grain centre, which includes the designation of positions, either within the labour union or outside of the labour union, in a supervisory or management role.

Mr. Cadieux: That issue is within the jurisdiction of the CLRB. They have already gone to the CLRB in order to determine whether or not the foreman should be included or excluded from that particular bargaining unit.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to ask another question. This question could be asked with regard to a particular clause, but if we get the answers on clause 1 we will not need to take as much time with the individual clauses.

The penalties are very severe: a maximum of $10,000 and a minimum of $500 for individuals. An amendment asking that the minimum penalty be removed so that a judge could set a small penalty if he thought the infraction deserved a smaller penalty than the current minimum was negated in the other place. I think that that is the way for legislation to be drafted in a democracy. The judge should be given that authority rather than to have a specific provision that a high minimum payment or minimum fine shall be imposed. Perhaps the minister could comment on that.

I welcome what I believe to be a fact, namely, that the punitive provisions in this bill are not as severe as the punitive provisions in Bill C-86, which provided for the resumption and continuation of postal services. Clause 11 of that particular bill said:

No individual who is convicted of an offence under this Act that was committed while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the union shall be employed in any capacity by, or act as an officer or representative of, the union at any time in the five years immediately after the date of the conviction.

It was stated strongly from time to time in debates that that type of penalty seemed far reaching and was interpreted—as I would interpret it—to be an undue infringement of basic rights. I am pleased that that particular feature is not included in this bill, but I would ask the minister why it is not there. What prompted the minister to leave it out?

Senator MacEachen: We objected to it in the past. We hope that the minister has had a conversion, that his appearances before us have had some effect!

Mr. Cadieux: Permit me to disagree with that in part, senator.

First, I would point out that it is my personal understanding that Bills C-24, C-85 and C-86 were passed and adopted in a democratic society, as I presume Bill C-106 will also be later on in the day.

Bill C-85, which dealt with the railway, included specifically the same penalties as the ones that are included in this particular bill. Bill C-86 contained the same penalties as those included in Bill C-24, which has already been passed.

Clause 11, as it was referred to, was excluded in relation to railway operations, and more particularly in this case because I believe the parties to this particular dispute are good, law-abiding citizens. As a matter of fact, Mr. Kancs has indicated publicly that he would obey the law and go back to work immediately, so I did not feel that in this particular case such a clause was necessary.

Senator Argue: I am glad to have that statement from the minister. However, I do not think that it was necessary in the post office legislation. The minister felt that it might be necessary, but my reading of the dispute and the attitude of Mr. Parrot was that this particular penalty, then, was not required. Since that penalty is not included in this bill, it is a less onerous bill. I think the minister's reading of the attitude of Henry Kancs and the Grain Workers' Union is accurate.

I am confident that when they are back on the job, even though they go back in circumstances that from their point of view were unnecessary and unpleasant—and they probably feel imposed upon—nonetheless, they will go back and do a commendable job.

As I said earlier, they operated last year at 120 per cent of capacity. That is pretty good. If you take the capacity of a terminal and you do 20 per cent better, that is good. In spite of the provocation—and I think there has been provocation—I think that the union will function well. The measure of goodwill that this union has amongst, at least, a substantial section of the grain producers will be maintained, and the confidence of that particular section of the grain producers will be demonstrated to have been warranted.

Mr. Cadieux: I would like to add a comment particularly on the attitude of the parties and on their attitude once they are back to work.

The honourable senator mentioned in his speech, I believe, an experience that he had in Thunder Bay, when he was the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, where, unfortunately, there was a two-week work stoppage. He stated that when the parties went back to work, they rolled up their sleeves and outdid the capacity that they normally would have produced without missing two weeks.

I must also underline an incident during my term as Minister of Labour when I had to deal with the Thunder Bay situation in October of last year. There was a work stoppage of six weeks in Thunder Bay. Eventually there was a settlement. There again, the parties rolled up their sleeves and exceeded the record of the preceding year, notwithstanding that six-week work stoppage.

I sincerely believe that in this case the grain will again be rolling and the parties—particularly the union—will work so that the damage caused to the farmers in particular will be minimal, and Canada's reputation as an exporter will be reinstated and will be, perhaps, even better.

I do not suggest that this is a solution to get a better record, but I believe that they will do their utmost in order to ensure that the unfortunate work stoppage here will not penalize anyone.

Senator Argue: I agree with the general remarks of the minister. The only difficulty here, of course, is that it is a period longer than two weeks so that the backlog is greater. The effort and good luck will have to be even greater than it has been in the past.

We have an excellent grain marketing system in Canada. I think it is the best in the world by far. The Canadian Wheat Board does a superb job of holding our markets and supplying on time grain of a guaranteed high quality. The Americans have been doing everything they can to capture our share of the grain markets, including giving away wheat. You cannot get it much cheaper than zero, and that is what they have been doing. Even under these circumstances our Canadian Wheat Board system—a board that operates in the interests of the public, but is responsible to a minister; works with all of the various components of the grain industry of this country, the cooperatives and the private grain trade—is an excellent operation.

On previous occasions I have raised in this house the absolute necessity of this government taking extraordinary measures to try to bring about an improvement in the balance of trade between Canada and the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union is our biggest customer, and we buy little from them. The response to date from the government has not been satisfactory in any way. But there has been an indication—and I believe it is now in the public domain—that the government has recently appointed Mr. Frank Rowan, a senior manager in the Canadian Wheat Board, to the Department of External Affairs. He was appointed to a position—I do not know his correct title; whether it is with the Soviet trade desk or whatever it is called—in the Department of External Affairs. His particular job will be to do everything he can to facilitate trade between Canada and the Soviet Union, including doing what he can, with others, to improve the market for Soviet goods in Canada. I think that is a constructive step forward, and I would hope that governments would look at the Canadian Wheat Board system with that kind of marketing arrangement as not only the best way to market Canadian grain but as also containing within it elements of a system which might help bring about a better balance.

When Frank Rowan takes up this position and talks to the Soviets, they will know him and have confidence in him. I think that a man of his stature, fully bilingual, raised in this part of Canada, and having spent most of his working life in western Canada, is an ideal person to undertake this particular program.

This is not the precise matter now before the Senate, but I think it is essential that the system we have in place be used to improve and expand trade with our biggest grain market.

Senator Turner: Let us be honest about it, labour relations are nothing more than human relations.

Why did the Department of Labour allow this dispute to go on for four years with no contract? Technological change is nothing new. In 1959 the CNR had to deal with technological change as it related to the railroad and the matter was settled. To the average person, who thinks only about his home, his job, his wife and family, and supporting his kids through university, four years is a long time. That type of person needs security, but no one in this country has that type of security any more. It seems that every dispute we hear of nowadays revolves around pensions, the indexing of pensions and technological change.

What are you as the minister of the department doing to prevent these types of disputes? I would suggest that you should be looking ahead in order to prevent these situations arising. To my mind, if workers have to go for four years with no contract, there is something wrong. What was the main obstacle which prevented the parties from coming to an agreement?

Mr. Cadieux: In order to have had that type of foresight in this particular dispute I would have had to have been the Minister of Labour in 1984. Unfortunately, that was not the case.

This dispute has been a long and difficult one. The parties have used all levels of the process afforded by the Canada Labour Code, and also chose in certain circumstances to go to the CLRB and to the Federal Court of Appeal in order to have certain points clarified. As you know, senator, certain legal proceedings, unfortunately, are sometimes more lengthy than one would want them to be. That is one of the main explanations why this has taken so long.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Turner: You do not need to have a B.A. to figure out that sooner or later a man will have to retire. The main issues today—and Mr. Bob White has said this many times—are pensions, the indexing of pensions and technological change. What is the Department of Labour doing to ensure that we come up with a dispute-settlement arrangement to eliminate these strikes which this country can no longer afford? No matter what the job entails, strikes are outdated. We must come up with something else. The boys are asking for some security, but there is no security today. That issue is raised again and again.

Mr. Cadieux: I would also like to point out, senator, that the recourses before the CLRB and the Federal Court of Appeal were instituted by the union.

With respect to the present collective bargaining process, with all due respect, and notwithstanding the unfortunate major or bigger issues which become obviously more public because of the media, in particular, last year 11,000 collective agreements were reached and signed in Canada and more than 90 per cent of those were reached and signed without one single day lost due to strike or lock-out. Over all, and notwithstanding unfortunate cases like this one, our system works pretty well.

Senator Turner: The average worker in Canada does not trust the unions and he does not trust management, and that is where the government should move in and set up a platform. If you give them the basics they will take it from there, but you are not doing that.

Mr. Cadieux: I thank the honourable senator for his advice. I am personally of the opinion right now that the system works pretty well. As a matter of fact, each time I intervene some members of the opposing parties, of course not in this place but in the other place, say that I should not intervene and let the process work.

Senator Turner: For years there were 132,000 employees in the CNR. With the introduction of diesel locomotives that number dropped to 80,000, and now Mr. Lawson is talking about 41,000. This is all as a result of technological change. More employees are going to find themselves on the street. They are asking for job security, and I believe that it is the government's job to ensure that they have that security. Today management will not hire a man aged 40 or 45 or a woman aged 30 or 35. If they are hired they will end up in minimum-paying jobs. In my opinion, that is not democracy.

Senator MacEachen: Free trade will fix that!

Senator Doody: I was going to say that.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-106, an act to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations at the Port of Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, on clause 7, I want to ask whether there is an agreement between the parties as to the matters in dispute. Have they already agreed what exactly is in dispute? That is my first question. My second question is: Will the minister formulate a statement constituting the matters under dispute for the arbitrator?

Mr. Cadieux: The parties do agree on the questions that are at issue in this particular dispute, and the arbitrator appointed will work according to the clauses in this particular bill.

Senator MacEachen: In addition to this clause 7, will a statement be provided to the arbitrator by the minister listing the matters in dispute, or will he derive that from the parties or from his own researchers?

Mr. Cadieux: The matters in dispute are indicated in that particular clause and, of course, the arbitrator will be speaking with the parties, and obviously he could be guided by the proposal that was made by Mr. Kelly when he was active in this particular dispute.

Senator MacEachen: The clause is general. I am not going to pursue this, but it does say, "...all matters relating to staffing...", and I would take it that there would be some precision required to list the matters. I am really asking whether the arbitrator will determine that for himself, based upon his discussions with the parties, or will the minister provide him with a statement of the matters in dispute as has been undoubtedly garnered in the course of the work of the Department of Labour and, particularly, by Mr. Kelly?

Mr. Cadieux: I am sure that the arbitrator will read clause 7 of this bill, will be meeting with the parties, and will establish the specific questions at issue within these guidelines; that is, this article and what the parties are going to tell the arbitrator.

Senator MacEachen: The minister's answer raises an interesting point—that, really, the matters in dispute are not known now but will only be known when the arbitrator determines them by discussions with the parties. I take it for granted that a series of questions has been discussed between the two parties, that these questions are identifiable, and that, indeed, it would be reasonable for us to ask now what these matters are.

Mr. Cadieux: The matters in dispute are staffing at the Grain Centre, job classification and security personnel. At the time of the appointment these questions are in dispute between the employer and the union. I am sure that the parties will be more than happy to explain to the arbitrator, if need be, specifically what they have been arguing about for the past four years. The issues are very well known to the parties. The arbitrator has enough to arbitrate on concerning the issues in dispute, which, again, are staffing at the Grain Centre, job classification and security personnel.

Senator MacEachen: That is right, but the minister will note that the clause says, "matters relating to staffing... job classification and security personnel." Presumably there are matters relating to staffing under dispute. What are those matters? What are the matters relating to job classification that are under dispute? What are the matters relating to security personnel that are under dispute? I would like to know now rather than having to wait for the arbitrator to find out.

Mr. Cadieux: With respect to staffing, the matter under dispute has to do with the number of people, as I indicated to another honourable senator earlier on. With respect to classification, I will seek the advice of my deputy minister so as to give you the specific information. Those matters are well known to the parties and will be well known to the arbitrator, I am sure. Perhaps you will just give me a moment.

With respect to classification, the matter in dispute is the type required in highly automated plants. With respect to security personnel, the matter in dispute is whether they are within the bargaining unit or whether they are within the management disposition.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question on clause 8, but it is partially related to what was discussed with respect to clause 7.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, we have not yet carried clause 7.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to raise this question now. Clause 8 begins by saying, "When the arbitrator has decided all matters..." Could the minister explain how the process is terminated when the arbitrator has reached a conclusion? I do not understand what happens. Is the matter referred to cabinet, and does cabinet make it legal? Is it perhaps merely necessary that the arbitrator declare that he has reached a decision, after which it becomes part of the law? Perhaps I could also ask who the arbitrator is obliged to listen to. Is he obliged to listen only to representatives of each of the two parties, or will other interested third parties have any right to intervene? I know there is some reference to the arbitrator's powers under the Canada Labour Code, but I am not familiar with that. My question, more specifically, is: Does anyone other than the two parties or representatives of the two parties have a right, and will such a party have an opportunity to express his views to the arbitrator?

Mr. Cadieux: The arbitrator determines his own rules of procedure. I am sure that the arbitrator will listen to the parties and to whoever they determine to be their spokesperson. I know that the parties in the mediation process were represented by legal counsel, for example, so I presume that they will be going before the arbitrator with whatever help they need. The parties are not new to these proceedings, because they have gone through the arbitration procedure before. They know specifically what it is all about. I am confident that they will make sure that they are heard—and well heard—by the arbitrator.

Senator Olson: In reviewing recent history—and you have the expert with you this afternoon—have other parties been allowed to attend or invited to present their interests and their views, based on those interests, to an arbitrator? I am speaking of parties other than the two directly involved.

Mr. Cadieux: This arbitration will not be like an industrial commission, such as the one set up in connection with Bill C-24, where obviously the industrial commissioner went broadly because the questions were broad and had perhaps a bigger ambit. I am informed that normally the arbitrator will deal with the parties themselves, and their representatives, of course.

Senator Olson: Those are the only ones invited?

Mr. Cadieux: Normally, yes.

Senator Olson: Is that to be the case in this situation?

Mr. Cadieux: As I mentioned earlier, the arbitrator will establish his own rules.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to make a comment with respect to the punishment that is provided for refusal to obey the legislation. On previous occasions the minister appeared before the Senate with a provision which would permit the stripping of a union officer of his post. At the time I found that provision to be extremely offensive. I remember expressing my disagreement with it and the hope that the minister would find it possible not to include such a provision in future back-to-work legislation.

I intended to congratulate the minister today on the omission of that provision, but I must say that my congratulations will be severely qualified by the reason he gave for not including the provision; namely, that he had reached a judgment in former cases where this provision was included that the union or union officers were not likely to obey the law and that therefore he put a special provision in. In this case he decided that they were likely to obey the law and so he did not include the provision.

I find that to be a pretty awful way to make law, that it flows from an arbitrary decision by a minister as to what is likely to be the conduct of a particular union. In other words, this is not a policy of general application; it is a selective policy based upon nothing other than the arbitrary judgment of the minister. If I am in the Senate and that provision is included in a bill which requires urgent passage, I will not cooperate, particularly when I have learned that the reason for the inclusion is as arbitrary as the reason given by the minister today. I did not like it from the beginning, said so, and urged that it not be done again. But to hear that it is included on such an arbitrary, whimsical basis rather than on a general principle is an added reason why I would be inclined to refuse cooperation to give a bill containing this provision such speedy passage. It is not in the bill today, so the question does not arise. All I say to the minister is: Would he reconsider and not base its inclusion on such an arbitrary basis as a personal or departmental judgment as to the particular character of a particular union? It sounds like law tailor-made to each particular case, and there is something wrong with that. I am sorry that the President of the Canadian Bar Association is not here, because I am sure he would tell me that this is contrary to the principles of natural justice.

Mr. Cadieux: First, clause 11, to which the honourable senator referred, dealt in the past not only with union officers but also with management officers. Both parties were subject to that particular clause. As you know, the clause was based on past experience. I do not like to qualify certain unions, but in connection with Bill C-86, that union had defied previous legislation. Consequently, past experience existed, and that was one of the reasons why that particular clause was in that bill.

Senator MacEachen: I think it is appropriate to punish citizens for failure to obey the law, but it is extraordinary to include an additional punishment which removes a person from his or her job. I say it is extraordinary to punish an individual, as was done in clause 11. If persons are convicted of an offence, they are punished by a series of fines. In addition, they lose their job as a union officer or as a representative of management for five years. It says:

No individual who is convicted of an offence under this Act that was committed while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the union shall be employed in any capacity by, or act as an officer or representative of, the union . . .

So they lose their job and their ability to hold office. That is an additional punishment which, it seems to me, is very questionable.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before leaving the Chair may I thank all honourable senators for their contributions, and also the minister for his appearance in the Senate so early in the year.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-106, to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations at the port of Prince Rupert, British Columbia, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

Ottawa

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

20 January 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 20th day of January, 1988, at 5:05 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

Yours sincerely,

Léopold H. Amyot

Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, January 26, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

On Question Period:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that Senator Murray is absent this afternoon on government business. I will be pleased to take as notice any questions which honourable senators might wish to pose.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that all Orders, Inquiries and Motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An act to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations at the port of Prince Rupert, British Columbia (Bill C-106, Chapter 1, 1988)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 26, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 26, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Gerald R. Ottenheimer has been summoned to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated:

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer, of St. John's, Newfoundland, introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. C. William Doody.

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867 in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1987

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-104, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CURRENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-99, to amend the Currency Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CUSTOMS ORDERS VALIDATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-96, to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

● (1410)

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-91, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1988 (Sessional Paper No. 332-664).

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to advise the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will be sitting tomorrow evening at six o'clock to examine Supplementary Estimates (D). This announcement will give notice to the members of that committee.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three fifteen o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday next, 28th January, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Notices of Motions:

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I wish to present another motion, asking for permission for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to meet today at 3:30 p.m. However, I do not yet have the motion, and I would therefore ask leave to revert to Notices of Motions later today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—ROLLBACK—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the headlines on the front page of the Globe and Mail of Friday, January 22, 1988, read: "Drug firms increase prices faster than inflation rate". The drug firms promised the Government of Canada that they would not do this, and that they would try to keep the price of drugs within the CPI. What does the government intend to do to ensure that these prices will revert to lower than the CPI until the Drug Prices Review Board has been set up?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, without attempting to revisit an old controversy and an old bill that took a very long time to pass in this house, let me say that the intentions of the government on this matter were made well known more than a year ago, when Bill C-22 was brought in. Had the bill been passed sooner and had the Drug Prices Review Board been in place, the board would have been in a position to act more effectively on this matter.

I expect the board will be in place within the next month or so. There can be no doubt that its existence means that there will be a downward pressure on the prices of drugs, with the rate of inflation as the marker.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government must know that Bill C-22 has been passed and that it is law. He must know that the drug manufacturers had promised the Senate and the House of Commons—and I suspect they had promised the minister, although I do not know that—that they would not do what they have already done a month and a half after this legislation was passed. According to the Ministry of Health in Ontario, some drug prices have been increased by 100 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: If we cannot trust the pharmaceutical companies a month and a half after the bill has been passed into law, are we going to be able to trust them with research money and with jobs? Is Canada going to be out all those billions of dollars and lose the 9,000 jobs in the generic drug companies and other companies? Our economy will be destroyed by paying this extra money for drugs and by losing the competition of the generic companies. Is the government going to say to these people, "You are breaking your promise a month and a half after the bill has been passed, and we are going to do something about it."? Is the government going to make it known that they are not happy about it? The minister has yet to say a word.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Drug Prices Review Board will be in place by March. I am glad to welcome the honourable senator as a belated convert to the usefulness of this organization.

Let me simply remind him that in the last full year for which his party had the responsibility of government the rate of inflation had been 5.8 per cent.

Senator Frith: Now we know that they are in trouble. They are still blaming the Grits!

Senator Murray: However, the drug prices, including generic drug prices, went up in that year by 12.8 per cent. It was precisely to avoid this kind of situation—

● (1420)

Senator Frith: What has that got to do with the price of tea in China or the price of drugs in Toronto?

Senator Murray:—that the government moved with Bill C-22 over a year ago to establish the Drug Prices Review Board.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am not talking about what happened years ago; I am talking about Bill C-22 and the promises given by the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada. It states in this news release:

In a few cases, drug prices rose by more than 100 per cent, and in one case the increase was 250 per cent, Mr. Archer said. He would not release the name of the drugs in question.

Ontario is attempting to impose a 5 per cent limit . . . The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, which represents the large multinational drug companies, pledged that drug price increases would not outstrip increases in the CPI when it lobbied successfully last fall for increased patent protection for brand-name drugs.

Let us not throw out these red herrings about what happened years ago under a Liberal administration or some other administration; let us talk about what happened with the CPI, the multinational drug companies and last year's Bill C-22. What is the government going to do about it?

ROLE OF DRUG PRICES REVIEW BOARD—ROLLBACK OF PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I did not think that we would be back on Bill C-22 as quickly as is happening now, but certainly every dire prediction that was made on this side, especially by those of us who sat on Senator Bonnell's committee and those of us who sat on Senator Sinclair's committee, is coming true. We predicted almost exactly what would happen.

Honourable senators, we could see that develop as we travelled across the country. Drug prices were going up very quickly. It was told to me personally by a druggist who knew the scene that the drug companies, knowing that it was most likely they would get their proposed Bill C-22 operational, wanted to set the standard of price as high as possible. That is the first point.

We were aware, as I indicated in a speech I gave in the Senate during the debate on Bill C-22, that the drug companies were gouging the public on the basis of trying to establish basic prices before the Drug Prices Review Board came into play. I suppose that was good business, but it was not in keeping with the assertion of the minister, who indicated that that would not be the case.

I say to the Leader of the Government that we are just beginning to see what the effect of Bill C-22 is going to be on the Canadian taxpayer and prescription drug users in Canada. We are just seeing the beginning!

There are no miracles. If the drug companies are going to put a billion dollars into research over the next ten years, as they said they would, they are not going to pay for that out of their own pockets. It has been a long time since I have heard of that kind of generosity. Those funds will come from higher drug prices, and those higher drug prices will not only pay for research but will mean enhanced profits for the drug companies.

I am not satisfied that the Drug Prices Review Board, which has been referred to by the Leader of the Government, is going to be the answer. Senator Sinclair may have something to say on this, but we were convinced that under the present legislation, which the minister refused to change, the Drug Prices Review Board did not have enough teeth to control the price of drugs, especially new drugs. We knew that then.

I have a few questions to pose to the leader. First of all, what control does the Drug Prices Review Board have on the price of new drugs being introduced to the market for the first time? Second, in view of the fact that the legislation was passed just last year, will the government immediately roll back the prices to what they should be, in keeping with the pledge that they would not increase more than the increase in the cost of living?

I think that is only fair to those who buy drugs; only fair to the people who listened to the government's absolute assertion that there would be no increase in drug prices. I would like to remind the leader that the Government of Ontario, in its submission to our committee, said that there would be an increase in cost of up to $1 billion over the next ten years. Let's not forget it. We see the scenario unfolding now.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate respond, then, as to whether in fact a serious effort will be made to roll back drug prices immediately, in keeping with the government's promises?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Drug Prices Review Board is the response of the government to the kind of problem raised by increases in the price of drugs. We believe that it is a good and constructive response, and we can only regret that honourable senators did not see fit to pass that bill at an earlier date.

As for the—

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

An Hon. Senator: That's nonsense!

An Hon. Senator: It was up to you to set the time!

Senator Frith: Flimflam!

Senator Murray: As for the statistical information sought by the honourable senator, I suggest that he put that question on the order paper and a reply will be forthcoming in due course.

Senator Frith: The flimflam is on!

Senator Bosa: The chickens have come home to roost!

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I think I have heard the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate state that the Drug Prices Review Board will be in place by March, and that that will put pressure on lowering the price of drugs.

I know that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not want to mislead this house. Could he tell me what section of Bill C-22 would give the authority to the Drug Prices Review Board to put pressure on anyone to lower the price of drugs?

Senator Murray: I have said that the existence of the Drug Prices Review Board will exert downward pressure on drug prices with the consumer price index as the marker—that was my statement.

Senator Frith: As “a marker”; it is not “the marker.”

Senator Murray: Well, as a marker, if you wish.

In any case, I do not have the act in front of me at the moment, and the honourable senator is quite capable of looking up the reference himself.

Senator Thériault: Well, honourable senators, yes, I have gone over that bill a thousand times and more. That is one of the reasons why I was not satisfied with the section in the bill that created the Drug Prices Review Board. Not only was I not satisfied but a great majority of people in Canada were not satisfied. I can only speak for myself, but had I known that the drug companies would take advantage of the short time that would elapse—

Senator Murray: —you would have passed the bill right away.

Senator Thériault: I would never have passed the bill, and I do not think many of us in the Senate would have passed it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am not surprised at all to hear the government and the Leader of the Government in the Senate trying to place the blame on the opposition for delaying the bill. Yes, we should be blamed—not for delaying but for passing that bill, which will cost the people of Canada, the senior citizens of Canada, the poor people of Canada, and the working poor of Canada billions of dollars in the next few years—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: —which will be taken by the drug companies across the border to the United States to satisfy the whim of the Conservative Government of Canada and the drug companies. Yes, you had better blame somebody, because there is going to be a lot of blame to be taken.

• (1430)

Senator Frith: It was a scam, and we were all the marks.

Senator Murray: My honourable friends' comments have been noted.

DRUG PRICES REVIEW BOARD—COMING INTO FORCE OF POWERS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the minister stated on two occasions that the board would be in place next month or so, and then he stated later that it would be in place in March. He went on to say that “It”—the board—“would exert downward pressure on prices with the CPI as a marker.” That is my note.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: When did the powers of the Drug Prices Review Board become effective?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sorry, but I cannot answer that question. It seems to me that there are regulations yet to be passed for the establishment of that board. Whether it became effective with proclamation, I do not know.

Senator Sinclair: I would suggest to the Leader of the Government that the bill indicates that certain sections will not come into force until later, but, as I recall, those are technical sections dealing with the Patent Act and have nothing to do with the provisions in the bill dealing with the Drug Prices Review Board. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would check that.

My further question is: If the sections dealing with the Drug Prices Review Board came into effect on proclamation, is that the effective date when downward pressure on prices with the CPI as a marker would run from?

Senator Murray: I can only convey to the Senate the statement of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who told the House of Commons—

Senator Guay: “There will be no increases,” he said.

Senator Murray: —the other day—on January 22, to be exact—that it will be necessary to get the regulations promulgated before the Drug Prices Review Board is able to exercise that authority.

Senator Sinclair: On what date does the authority become operative? Is it when the board is set up or when the bill was proclaimed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to inquire.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—BASIS OF STATISTICS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, earlier the Leader of the Government made reference to certain statistics. Could he tell us whether those were based on figures from Statistics Canada covering all drugs or whether they were based on drugs subject to patents or drugs subject to generic competition? Just what were they? Were they rough figures furnished by Statistics Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The information I conveyed to the house a few moments ago indicates the increase in 1983 drug prices, including generic drugs. That was the information I had before me. I do not have any further information as to the methodology that was used in calculating those.

Senator Sinclair: My question is: Do those figures from Statistics Canada deal with drugs generally? If they do, that is not germane to the issues which were dealt with in Bill C-22. I would ask the Leader of the Government to check the basis upon which those figures were given. Would he do that for us?

Senator Murray: I do not understand why the honourable senator believes that the argument would not be germane. I do not have the figure in front of me at the moment, but, as I recall, the rate of inflation in that year was something between 5 and 6 per cent, and the increase in drug prices, including generic drug prices, was in excess of 12 per cent. That was the point I was making.

Senator Sinclair: My question really is: Are the figures furnished by Statistics Canada based on prescription drugs or drugs generally?

Senator Murray: I have heard the question and will see whether I can get a more precise answer for the honourable senator.

REQUESTS RE DRUG PRICING

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Could the government leader advise us whether the government has received any requests from Cancer Research or organizations such as that dealing with the issue being discussed here today, the movement of prices of prescription drugs?

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Can the government leader tell us whether the reliance on what the Drug Prices Review Board may do will be the only action taken by the government to deal with the problem of these enormous price increases? When the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appeared before the committee, I believe he volunteered—I do not think it was in response to a question—that he understood that price control was ultra vires of the federal government's authority; in other words, that the government could not set up a Drug Prices Review Board which had the power to set or control prices, and that this board's authority would be limited either to granting or to withdrawing the exclusivity under the patent rights. That is where the authority of the Drug Prices Review Board was to be exercised.

As a number of senators have already pointed out, the drug companies came before the committee and gave a solemn undertaking that they would not increase drug prices in excess of the CPI. Can the minister tell us whether the government intends to take any action to see that that is done? The committee and the public of Canada were led to believe that the minister had obtained a pledge from the drug companies such that they would stay within the CPI in terms of the increases in drug prices. Is the government planning to do anything about this situation other than to rely on the Drug Prices Review Board some weeks down the road? Is the government going to do something now to try to persuade the drug companies to keep their word?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, believing as we do that the various powers contained in that act, including those of the Drug Prices Review Board, are more than adequate, we do not contemplate any further measures at this time.

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that these increases to which Senator Bonnell and others have referred—some as high as 230-odd per cent—will be allowed. Is the government going to stand idly by and watch the drug companies take these enormous increases that are completely contrary to their undertakings?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the entire series of questions is based upon one article in the Globe and Mail. I think that should be put on the record.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not difficult to go to some of the prescription drugstores to find out the percentage of increase in various prices. If the government is not going to take its responsibility and do that itself, then we will try to do some of its homework for it.

DATE OF RESTRICTION OF DRUG PRICE INCREASES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if it is not true that the act to which Royal Assent was given on November 19, 1987, brings into effect the new regime with regard to exclusivity as of June 27, 1986. The government leader will recall that members of the opposition protested against that early date, but that the government was insistent that that was the date as of which the new exclusivity regime would be in effect.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: If that is the date on which the benefits of the drug companies under this legislation become effective, why is it not also true that the restrictions on price increases should be effective as of June 27, 1986?

Senate a few moments ago, but I will inquire to see whether he has anything further to add on that subject.

GENERIC DRUGS—REMOVAL FROM SALE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Following on from the last question to the Leader of the Government, as of June 1986, the date on which this legislation was to apply, the reason for one of the significant Senate amendments was that generic drugs which came on the market after that date would be withdrawn from the shelf.

Senator Frith: That's right.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators will recall, as a significant factor, that a widely sold drug for ulcers was to be taken off the market—and, so far as I know, is now off the shelf at a cost of literally millions of dollars to Canadians—as of that date, back to 1986. Senator Sinclair's committee, of which I was proud to be a member, recommended that that retroactivity be eliminated; in other words, that if Bill C-22 was going to be passed we should at least leave on the shelf those generic drugs that were on sale as of the date of proclamation. That was rejected by the minister.

To follow up the on last question, if that is the case—namely, that prices will not be rolled back all the way to June 1986—then how can we really accept the fairness, the equality, of removing generic drugs from the shelf which are now not for sale?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator—and this is not for the first time today—is seeking to debate and re-open the whole issue and many of the matters that were discussed here before.

Senator Frith: In other words, he doesn't have an answer!

Senator Murray: I don't doubt its legitimacy; but I tell the honourable senator that I will refer his question to my colleague, Mr. Andre, for a reply.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—ROLLBACK POWERS OF MINISTER

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, on the same issue, it appears that the Leader of the Government is telling the Senate that there appears to be a powerless period on the part of the Canadian government extending from the time the act was promulgated until the time the Drug Prices Review Board is established; and even when it is established it will not have the power under this act to roll back prices during that period.

It also appears, based on the information that is available to all honourable senators, that there has been an extraordinary increase in prices during the past several months that does not seem to relate to costs or to the economy. As a matter of fact, during that period the economy took a bit of a nose dive in the market. I guess that when the market goes down drug prices go up. That seems to be the only connection, which obviously is a tenuous one at best.

My question to the Leader of the Government, and through him to the minister, is whether there are other powers available to the minister under other acts dealing with this matter—namely, prices—which may in effect give the minister some power to examine or investigate these extraordinary increases in such a short period. It may appear that these prices were raised by a number of companies perhaps in concert. Perhaps some thought was given by the senior executives of those corporations to raising the prices and therefore raising the base during that period of time. If that is the case, then that appears to be an anti-competitive practice, a combines practice. Surely the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Grafstein: —must have some powers available to him to deal with the circumstance; and perhaps the Leader of the Government might report back to us after he has had an opportunity to consider that with the minister.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As the honourable senator has suggested, I will refer the question to my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I invite the honourable senator's attention, however, to Mr. Andre's statement of January 22 in the House of Commons to the effect that prior to Bill C-22 providing a capability through the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board there had not been ability on the part of the federal government to monitor the prices of drugs and keep them within reasonable levels.

Senator Frith: Look at what he said in the House months ago about prices not exceeding the CPI.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF CONSUMER AFFAIRS MINISTER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. As I look over this news release, I find that it says that 1,099 drugs have gone up in price—I repeat, 1,099 drugs. Those are drugs which affect consumers: the aged, the infirm, the sick, people in institutions and hospitals, the unemployed, and so on. Would the Leader of the Government ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, if he is not going to do something to protect the consumers will he, for the sake of the consumers and the Canadian people in general, resign? He should stay on as Minister of Corporate Affairs, but he should resign as Minister of Consumer Affairs, because he is certainly not protecting the consumers of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only conclude that the fuss that is being made by honourable senators opposite on this matter today is the product of a guilty conscience—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: —for not having passed the bill at an earlier date.

Senator Argue: What crap!

Senator Frith: First prize for bare-faced gall!

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government will recall that in conjunction with the discussion and implementation of Bill C-22 there was a commitment made to the provinces that a sum of $25 million per year would be given to the provinces in compensation for the increase in drug prices based on the CPI. Now that the government knows that the drug companies did not abide by that, that the increases being imposed on the provinces and consumers will be much more than the CPI, will the Leader of the Government undertake to review that amount and increase it so that provinces can retain their drug programs for the poor, the sick and the aged?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will refer that question also to my colleague.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, if it is no longer in the legislation, would the Leader of the Government ask the minister whether he will volunteer to put it in the legislation, because I think he will find that it was taken out?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are not contemplating any amendments to Bill C-22 at the moment.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE APPEARANCE OF DRUG COMPANY SPOKESMEN

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government give us an undertaking to support a reference to a committee of the Senate—probably the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee—to recall the spokesmen for the drug companies in order to have them try to explain why they did not keep their pledge to keep prices within the CPI?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the committee is master of its own procedures and can do that if it wishes to do so.

Senator Olson: Then I take it that you would support that kind of action?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not my habit to interfere with the work of the committees. This is perhaps not germane to the present discussion, but I would ask that some care be taken with budgetary matters if assignments are being given or new committees contemplated.

Senator Frith: The drug companies might be able to pay their own costs!

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PMAC AND UNITED STATES PHARMACEUTICAL MANUFACTURERS

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether there is any direct connection between the pharmaceutical manufacturers in the United States and the PMAC in Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend should direct that question to the parties concerned.

Senator Turner: Can the Leader of the Government answer the following question: Is the PMAC Canadian, or are all of its members American or multinational drug companies?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is not a circle in which I travel. I do not know those people, nor do I know very much about them.

Senator Frith: Good for you!

Senator Murray: I would therefore suggest that my honourable friend direct his inquiries to the president, if it has one, or to the executive director, if it has one, of the PMAC or its American counterpart. That is not information that comes to me. I am reminded that Mrs. Erola is their spokesperson in the capital, and she would be someone well known to my honourable friend. He could make a telephone call to her and obtain the information he is seeking.

Senator Frith: We don't travel in that circle either!

An Hon. Senator: Not any more.

Senator Frith: We are more careful about our travelling companions!

ACTIVITIES IN UNITED STATES OF MULTINATIONAL AND U.S. DRUG COMPANIES

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, can the honourable minister tell me what is going on in the United States of America with these multinational and American drug corporations? Let me give him a little information. I have here a quotation taken from that great magazine the National Examiner.

Senator Doody: We don't travel in that circle either.

Senator Turner: The article reads, in part:

Some drug companies are trying to scare consumers and doctors away from government-approved generic drugs in favor of more expensive brand names, says Democratic Senator Howard Metzenbaum, of Ohio. Some have offered doctors airline tickets in exchange for prescribing certain products, drugs, he said.

Outraged doctors are protesting the companies' policies, Metzenbaum added.

Further, I have a quotation from the United Transportation Union publication entitled Retiree News. I referred to this publication several times during the committee hearings. The article is entitled "Drug makers accused of waging campaign based on disinformation". The honourable senator is smiling, but people will be paying higher prices for their drugs, especially seniors, so he had better take this question seriously. The article reads:

Brand-name pharmaceutical manufacturers are using scare tactics and disinformation in a campaign to sink a measure which would provide for the first time Medicare coverage of prescription drugs, according to Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio).

Earlier this year, the House passed a catastrophic health care bill that included Medicare coverage for prescription drugs, and the Senate is considering its own package which includes an amendment that would reimburse Medicare patients for annual drug costs above $600.

The amendment to the Senate measure requires that the drugs be less costly generic drugs unless a doctor specifically states that a brand-name drug is medically necessary.

Metzenbaum said the multi-million-dollar campaign by the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association has been trying to convince seniors that generic drugs are less safe than brand-name drugs, the Senate measure will ultimately cost them more and that it will reduce incentives to develop new medicines because of lost profits.

"Don't buy it. Not a word of it," Metzenbaum said.

"This issue has to do with profits and greed," he said. "Nothing More. Nothing less."

Metzenbaum said seniors spend about $9 billion a year for prescription drugs and it is time they had some help.

That $9 billion figure is for the United States. I suggest that the government look into these charges—either that or sue the companies.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION FROM PMAC OR MULTINATIONAL DRUG COMPANIES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs communicated in any way with PMAC or any multinational pharmaceutical company to obtain an explanation for the exorbitant rise in over 1,000 prescription drug prices in the past two years? These increased prices have brought great hardship on low-income Canadians, as well as added to the financial burden of many provincial drug plans.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

[Senator Turner.]

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE STUDY OF CONCERNS OF MILITARY FAMILIES— PRESENTATION AND PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Question No. 38 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden.

2nd December 1987—Regarding the committee study of concerns of military families (i) will the committee present its report to Parliament before the Christmas adjournment; (ii) if not, when is the committee expected to present its report to Parliament; and (iii) will the committee's report be published and made available?

Reply by the Minister of National Defence:

(i) The release of the report is expected before the end of January 1988.

(ii) The Advisory Group was not a Parliamentary Committee and therefore the report was submitted to the Minister rather than to Parliament.

(iii) Yes.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS)—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-12, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Qualifications of Senators).—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in my name. I have no intention of trying to hold up the debate on this order. I merely stood the order in my name in case other honourable senators wanted to speak to it.

Order stands.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1987

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-104, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I will just be a minute or two in explanation. If honourable senators have seen the House of Commons Debates of January 22, last Friday, they will have noted that there was—I was going to say, “little debate”, but, in fact, there was no debate with respect to the passage of Bill C-104. The reason is that a bill of this nature has its own procedure, a procedure which provides for no debate in either of the houses. The purpose of this design is to have such bills reviewed by the two committees—that is, the Justice Committee of the House of Commons and our own Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

For example, when this matter came before our committee as a draft bill objections were raised with regard to one matter which we considered to be of a controversial nature. Therefore, we asked that it be eliminated from the bill, and it was.

Senator Frith: What was the matter?

Senator Nurgitz: It was with regard to incorporating the Internal Economy Committee of the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: Incorporate?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, “incorporate”—I hope I have the right word. In any event, it is the committee of the House of Commons which, for example, negotiates with staff on behalf of management, and the purpose of the measure was to give it, in essence, legal entity to negotiate with either unions or the public service in one fashion or another. It may well have been a good idea, but it was not our purpose to become involved in such a question. We thought at the time that the measure should not be dealt with in this fashion, that it deserved to be in a bill of its own.

Bill C-104 is the fifth bill of this kind, where various little anomalies or, with the passage of time, archaic matters are removed. I might also mention that because of the bilingual nature of our laws many translation errors are also corrected. Briefly, that covers the matter. So, what honourable senators have before them now is a bill which has received the unanimous approval of all parties in the House of Commons committee and of the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in the form of a report, which report was unanimously accepted in the House of Commons without debate on Friday of last week.

Honourable senators, I urge upon you similar treatment of this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government was good enough to send me a copy of a memorandum on this bill from the minister's office which would seem to explain why lengthy debate on this bill is not called for. As Senator Nurgitz has also pointed out, the memorandum stated:

Bill C-104 has already been studied by the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General and the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In fact all provisions in the bill have been agreed to unanimously in both committees.

That is, I take it, with the exception of the provision that was referred to by Senator Nurgitz.

• (1500)

The memorandum also points out that this is the fifth bill under the program. Senator Nurgitz has told us that this is an ongoing program to pick up inconsistencies, mistakes and including, I assume, purely typographical errors that sometimes escape attention when the bill is passed, because all of the provisions of this bill deal with law. That is, we are not dealing with bills but with matters that have now been passed into law.

The memorandum also goes on to state:

The 4 previous bills have all been passed at all stages without debate.

I may say that I am reassured by the statement that this particular bill has been studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and has received the unanimous support of that committee. However, I intend to adjourn the debate on this bill for one day simply because I want the opportunity to study that report. Perhaps Senator Nurgitz or Senator Neiman can tell me where I might find the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs dealing with this bill. That information could be conveyed to me sometime today, or at least before our sitting tomorrow, so that I can have a look at the report.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

TAX REFORM 1987

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), for the adoption of the Twentieth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Tax Reform in Canada), tabled in the Senate on 1st December, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to intervene in the debate on this order. However, as Senator Doody said with respect to another order, I am inviting anyone who wishes to speak on this matter to do so. I therefore wish to stand the order so that that opportunity will continue.

Order stands.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FORUM IN SASKATOON, OCTOBER 25-28, 1987—DEBATE
CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks calling the attention of the Senate to the Forum on Post-secondary Education held in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, from October 25—October 28, 1987.—
(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, Senator Hicks was so kind as to adjourn the debate on my behalf, and as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I want to thank him and congratulate him on his comments after attending the Forum on Post-secondary Education as an active participant.

I also want to thank him for his invaluable contribution to the committee's report on a question of vital importance to the social, cultural and economic future of our country.

I was anxious to take part in this debate since the question of the need for a national forum was discussed at length by the Committee on National Finance during preparations for its Report on Federal Policy on Post-secondary Education. In the report we concluded that post-secondary education will continue to be, as it always has been, the responsibility of the provinces. We also concluded that the federal government clearly had a role to play in certain areas of post-secondary education such as research, and that it shared responsibility for accessibility, and more specifically for student assistance.

I noted that forum participants had determined that governments and the provinces should co-operate in five specific areas of post-secondary education: foreign students, student assistance, research, upgrading data and providing a better program for research on education. I also noted the absence of any discussion of EPF, in other words, the federal government's transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education. However, that was predictable, especially since one can hardly discuss this question without the active participation of the finance ministers, whose concerns would, of course, extend to many other aspects, including equalization.

What worried me most, however, was the absence of any final statement on specific follow-up mechanisms by the Secretary of State or by the Honourable Roland Penner, Manitoba's Minister of Education and President of the Council of Ministers of Education.

It is true that although there was no statement about a new structure that would support this kind of national responsibility, the Council of Ministers agreed to meet with the Secretary of State in 1988 to discuss measures emanating from the conclusions of the forum.

I hope it will be a positive statement, although sometimes I have my doubts. In the National Finance Committee's report on this question, we pointed out that in his annual report to Parliament last year, the Secretary of State included a section on federal-provincial consultations. This is what we said in our report:

The . . . annual report . . . included a section of federal-provincial consultations. This section makes extensive reference to the number of meetings which took place, but conspicuously omits mentioning any conclusions or results emanating from these meetings.

This quote is taken from page 30 of our report.

I hope the meeting in February will be a confirmation of the kind of co-operation without which the Saskatoon forum could not have been organized, and that it will not perpetuate the lack of communication that has long been characteristic of federal-provincial relations in this field. The good intentions of Mr. Crombie and Mr. Penner alone will not do the trick. All provincial Ministers of Education will have to make their contribution as well.

I may be raising this question again later this year, after the meeting scheduled with the Secretary of State and the Council of Ministers of Education, depending on what transpires from the meeting.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—PUBLIC RESPONSE TO PETITION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the response of Canadians to a petition mailed out, calling upon Parliament to urge the government to act on the motion dealing with the production of the NFB film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to say a word on this order. In view of the circumstances, namely, the fact that the National Film Board has decided to produce another documentary on Billy Bishop, the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs will be meeting tomorrow in order to obtain a consensus on how we should deal with Order No. 13.

Order stands.

FISHERIES

INTERIM COMMITTEE REPORT ON FRESHWATER FISHERIES—RESPONSE OF MANITOBA MINISTER—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 19, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a response from the Minister of Natural Resources of the Government of Manitoba relating to the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in its Interim Report on the Freshwater Fisheries, tabled in the Senate on the 2nd October, 1987, and on other matters arising therefrom.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries has produced its second interim report on the west coast fisheries, I ask that this item be removed from the order paper because it is redundant.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND ITS PEOPLE

CONCERNS AND INTERESTS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. Ethel Cochrane rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 19, 1987:

That she will call attention of the Senate to concerns and interests of Newfoundland and its people.

She said: Honourable senators, I had intended to make these remarks in late 1987; however, speaking engagements and other pressures both inside and outside this chamber prevented me from doing so. I did rise earlier to say goodbye to our colleague and friend, Senator Rowe, on the occasion of his retirement, and I moved third reading of a bill. However, I hope that this chamber will not consider those few brief remarks as my maiden address. I understand that senators are accorded a certain degree of freedom in their maiden address, and while this is a time-honoured tradition I will be as brief as possible. Before proceeding I want to join my colleagues in extending a warm welcome to an outstanding Newfoundlander who joins us today. Senator Ottenheimer has a long and distinguished career of public service in Newfoundland and Labrador, and I look forward to working with him.

I want to begin by expressing my sincere appreciation to all senators and the Senate staff who advised and helped me during my first year on Parliament Hill. The transition from the teaching profession to the Senate was made much easier because of the very kind consideration extended to me by so many kind and helpful people here on Parliament Hill. In particular, I want to thank Senator Doody and his secretary, Mary Lascelles; Senator Marshall and his staff; and Senator Murray and his staff, for their patience and assistance. I am also grateful to the staff of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament for the numerous articles they prepared for me and for their help with the statistics I will be using today. I also express my appreciation to Premier Peckford for his advice on the issues that should be raised.

Before I came to the Senate, and while I was a teacher back in Newfoundland, one would hear criticism about how teachers were overpaid for working only five hours a day. This type of undeserved criticism was really born out of ignorance. By far the vast majority of teachers that I know back in Newfoundland are very hard working, totally dedicated and totally committed to their profession and to their students. Many work long hours, and many work six or seven days a week. Of course, there are a few who do only what they have to do, but, by and large, they are certainly in a very small minority. When I left the teaching profession to come to Ottawa I naively thought I would no longer have to listen to unfounded criticisms about my profession. It really came as a great surprise to me to discover that the Senate and teachers from Newfoundland and Labrador had a great deal in common. The perception that both groups are overpaid and underworked was, and is, unfounded. I am really appalled at this misconception, because, speaking from my own point of view, I have been extremely busy in the short time I have been a senator. I work between ten and twelve hours a day. Often I work six days a week, and sometimes I work seven. I have not had a week yet since my appointment where I worked only five days. I know of other senators who work equally hard or even harder than I. Perhaps we are guilty of not really keeping the public as fully informed as we should about what we do.

A couple of years ago the Newfoundland Teachers' Association was quite concerned about the negative image of teachers in our province and decided to do something about it. They recognized that a serious information gap existed, and they started a public relations campaign to inform fully the citizens of Newfoundland and Labrador about the importance of teachers in the educational process. Criticism of the teaching profession has dramatically declined since the public relations campaign began, and an ongoing effort will always be required to keep it down to minimal levels.

In view of the constant criticism of the Senate, perhaps the time has come when the Senate should consider making a more conscious effort to inform Canadians of its role. I am not suggesting that a public relations campaign similar to the Newfoundland teachers' be launched, but I merely point out their strategy to show that a lot of unfounded criticism can be reduced once the public is informed. However, I did not rise to address that problem; I just mention it in passing, because senators and teachers had and have one thing in common: both groups receive a lot of undeserved criticism. The Newfoundland Teachers' Association addressed its problem, and it seems to have worked for them to a certain extent. Perhaps we need to assess our situation here and start letting the public know how busy senators are and the role the Senate plays in our democratic process.

During the past 12 months I have read several articles expressing the opinion that the Senate was no longer looking after the regional interests of the country, as it was intended to do. Today I intend to focus on some of the concerns and interests of Newfoundland and its people, and I would like to address six of the major issues facing our province. These are: regional disparity, transfer payments, regional and economic development, defence spending, resources and transportation.

As you know, joining Confederation in 1949 was not an easy decision for the people of our province, and there are those today who continue to debate the merits of that decision, just as there are similar debates in other provinces about the relative merits of Confederation. Newfoundland entered Confederation for the same primary reason as the other provinces did—the hope that it would lead to a higher standard of living for its people and an accelerated rate of economic development. There have been tremendous gains in terms of our standard of living since we became a province, and there have been quantum leaps in the quality and availability of education and health care, transportation, roads, airports, municipal services, and in many other areas where gains could not have been made without federal monetary contributions. In spite of these gains, which have been numerous, the people of Newfoundland continue to suffer the highest unemployment rate in Canada, 24.4 per cent in March of 1987, and a per capita earned income just 52 per cent of the national average in 1986. The unemployment rate was down to 17.1 per cent in October 1987, a welcome decline indeed, but it is still approximately twice the national average. The province's fiscal capacity—as defined by the federal government to reflect each province's ability to raise revenue from its own sources—was only 59 per cent of the national average in 1985. The Honourable John Collins, Provincial Minister of Finance, said in his 1987 budget speech:

...ever since Confederation, our gain in per capita income has been small, slow and uncertain, with significant gaps persisting throughout, leaving us the chronically poorest in the nation, and especially negatively affected by the recent recession.

The minister went on to say:

...it is particularly noteworthy that the fiscal capacity spread between ourselves and the Maritime Provinces' average widened from seven percentage points in 1980 to ten percentage points by 1985, confirming that the basic economic problem in this province cannot be considered as simply one aspect of a general Atlantic Canada problem, but is an inherent structural disorder unique to Newfoundland and Labrador and demanding particular approaches for its correction.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, Newfoundland and Labrador still faces some serious problems 40 years after we became a province; the efforts to overcome regional disparity have not been all that successful and were recently called into question by the Macdonald royal commission.

A research report by N. Harvey Lithwick, entitled "Federal Government Regional Economic Development Policies: An Evaluative Survey", Volume 64, Disparities and Inter-Regional Adjustment, in the series of studies prepared for the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada, concluded:

Our most important finding is that regional disparities have not disappeared. Despite widely varying policy thrusts and economic circumstances, there has been little improvement in the relative position of most of the poorer provinces...

[Senator Cochrane.]

Since Newfoundland entered Confederation then, the availability of such services as educational and medical care, to cite two examples, has improved dramatically, but relative incomes have remained extremely low, unemployment chronically high, and economic development has been spotty at best. It is against that background that I would like to paint some impression of the other economic issues facing Newfoundland today.

Respecting transfer payments, because of our depressed economy, low income levels, high unemployment and small fiscal capacity Newfoundland has been heavily dependent on fiscal transfer payments both to individual citizens and to the provincial government to support services to those citizens. The costs of social programs continue to rise, particularly health and educational expenditures, far more rapidly than the rate of inflation. This current fiscal year Newfoundland will spend over $577 million on education, an increase of $57 million over the previous fiscal year, and will spend $546 million as well on health care, a $35 million increase in this field. But revenues from Established Programs Financing, which subsidizes costs of health and post-secondary education, will be reduced by an estimated $6.7 million; equalization payments to Newfoundland will decline by an estimated $36 million; and transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan are expected to be over $1 million lower than in the 1986-87 fiscal year. Transfer payments are made on a per capita basis, and the preliminary 1986 census data indicate a decline of about 10,000 in our province's population. Given the present formula for calculating transfer payments, those reductions are perfectly legitimate, but it is extremely difficult for a smaller province to try to stimulate economic recovery and development when costs are increasing and major sources of revenue are declining significantly. If we are even to maintain the levels of social services we have achieved perhaps the transfer payments system needs to be revised to give some protection against the very serious budgetary effects of population decline.

Respecting regional economic development, a reading of the "Federal Government Regional Economic Development Policies: An Evaluative Survey" by Harvey Lithwick, prepared for the Macdonald royal commission, shows that over the last quarter of a century or so numerous efforts have been made to overcome regional disparities. I am told by my advisers back in Newfoundland that the disbandment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1981 and its replacement with the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion was seen by many as a negative blow against regional economic development in our province, because in many respects the wealthier provinces could qualify for funding, thus, in effect, competing with the poorer provinces and negating the whole purpose of the program.

A review of the 1987-88 federal estimates shows that overall spending for the economic and regional development envelope declined from $14,851 million in 1984-85 to a projected $11,955 million in 1987-88. The economic and regional development envelope share of total federal expenditure has fallen from 13.1 per cent in 1981-82 to 9.9 per cent in 1987-88. No doubt there are many good reasons why this decline occurred, including the need to reduce the deficit, the need to evaluate programs, the need to change direction, and so on, but it is encouraging to see an increase in spending this fiscal year over the previous fiscal year. I am aware that when considering the regional and economic impact one should consider the total expenditures from all government sources to get an overall picture. However, I will only comment on the areas where shortfalls are causing concerns and hardships for our province.

Another section of Harvey Lithwick's article commenting on the impact of regional economic development policies from the mid-1960s to 1983 concluded:

The widely discussed "improvement" in personal incomes that is supposed to have taken place in the eastern half of Canada has been due to the eastern provinces' increased share of transfer payments only.

It seems reasonable to conclude that there has been no discernible progress with regard to regional development. This finding alone would appear to be a serious indictment of the many policy efforts, and very large public sector outlays, that were designed to achieve that goal.

In any event, there are grounds for serious doubt about the depth of federal concern over regional development. In fact, most federal regional efforts have gone into compensatory policies, with very few programs directed to actual development. To demonstrate this point... from a high of 9.9 % of transfers in the Pearson era, economic development programs currently add up to only 3.7% of transfers. (Comparing) DREE's departmental expenditures to federal transfers, we observe here another steady decline, from close to 6% in the early years (1968-73) to 2.5% in 1983...

In the most recent period, 1973-81, when regional policy had become a serious and reasonably well articulated goal of public policy, real disparities actually worsened for all the poorer provinces save Quebec, whose position remained roughly stagnant.

Under DRIE, development funding has not only decreased in absolute terms but has also been redirected to the more rather than the less economically developed parts of the country. Premier Brian Peckford drew attention to that problem in his speech to the Rotary Club of St. John's in March 1987. He said:

In 1976-77 the federal government expended $93 million on regional development in central Canada. Newfoundland's share was $46 million.

In 1984-85 the federal government expended $257 million on central Canada. Newfoundland's share ten years later, again $46 million. Let's break these regional development expenditures down a little further.

The Premier went on to say:

Under the Industrial Regional Development Program (IRDP) and its forerunner, Regional Development Incentive, Newfoundland received $1.5 million in 1976-77, while central Canada received $41 million. In 1984-85 Newfoundland received $3.8 million, an increase of just over $2 million, while central Canada received almost $177 million—an increase of $136 million.

He went on to say:

Other federal initiatives designed to stimulate investment and development have little or no positive impact on our province. Take, for example, federal research and development dollars. At a recent meeting of ministers responsible for science and technology, we learned that the federal government intends to spend in the area of $800 million. That's almost $1 billion. But the regional breakdown of this funding is all too familiar. British Columbia, 4%. The Prairies, 7%. Quebec, 32%. Ontario, 29%, and the Atlantic Region, that's all four provinces, 7%. We've learned further that the entire 7% for Atlantic Canada is designed to go to Halifax.

Between January 1986 and January 1987, the total number of jobs in the country rose by 137,000 according to unadjusted figures. But only 5,000 of those jobs were created outside Ontario.

As you can see from the excerpts from Premier Peckford's speech, he too has some concerns about economic development programs as an instrument of achieving equality in Newfoundland and Labrador.

A similar assessment was made by Donald Savoie, an economist at the University of Moncton, who gives an evaluation of DRIE in his book Regional Economic Development: Canada's Search for Solutions, published last year. He states:

● (1530)

DRIE is a sectoral department concerned with Canada's industrial performance. Its program is national in scope and possibilities exist for government funding for projects, even in Toronto...

DRIE regional officials report that over time the program will favour even more... the more developed regions of the country.

He goes on to say:

The reason, they point out, is twofold. First, DRIE will invariably focus on sectoral problems and assess all new initiatives from the sectoral perspective without attaching sufficient importance to regional considerations. Specifically, they maintain that initiatives from northern New Brunswick will be assessed from the same perspective as those from southern Ontario...

He further writes:

Second, DRIE never provides the maximum level of assistance available under Tier 4 (the poorest regions). The most that DRIE has agreed to grant thus far under Tier 4 is 60 per cent of the maximum allowed.

The one potentially bright note in the regional development picture is the establishment of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. This agency, however, must receive sufficient funding and be autonomous to respond to the specific needs of the Atlantic region. Perhaps the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency can develop into a workable vehicle to refocus development funding and establish criteria and goals that will benefit the Atlantic region where other programs have failed. I commend the government on this new initiative.

Turning now to defence issues, defence spending can play a vital role in the development of a provincial economy—especially a small provincial economy. Not only is the direct spending important but the economic spinoffs—spending on services, improving the province's tax base, spurring technological development—are all important. But despite Newfoundland's strategic maritime position and our legacy of an extensive military infrastructure from as recently as the mid-1960s, we have few defence dollars from the Canadian government being spent in Newfoundland. Perhaps it was the great American presence that interfered with Canadian military spending in our province.

During the Second World War and for almost a quarter of a century after, until the mid-1960s, the Americans had numerous bases, stations and other installations spread throughout Newfoundland and Labrador. Tens of thousands of Americans were stationed there. They employed thousands of civilians and thus spent hundreds of millions of dollars. Before 1949 the Americans dealt with Great Britain in getting permission to set up bases in Newfoundland. When Newfoundland entered Confederation in 1949 the American military were already well established in numerous locations around our province, and Canada, I assume, did not want to compete with the American military presence in a province that was already so well protected. Consequently, Canadian defence efforts were concentrated in other provinces—with some of them close to Newfoundland. However, for the most part, the American military have disappeared from Newfoundland and, in reality, have been gone for 20 years or so. Today they only have a skeleton force in Argentia and a small presence in Labrador. There is a common belief in Newfoundland that the Canadian government left the military spending to the Americans. Now that the Americans have pulled out, a great void exists in defence spending in our province, but the commitment is so great in the other provinces that the Canadian government finds it very difficult to increase its level of spending in Newfoundland.

The per capita defence expenditures in Newfoundland are about one-third of the Canadian provincial average and about one-tenth the level of the maritime provinces. In 1982-83 Ontario benefited from 47 per cent of defence expenditures; Newfoundland and Labrador got 0.7 per cent. This is why our province has been pushing so hard for a NATO base in Labrador and a Sea Cadet base in Stephenville, and generally for a more realistic, equitable share of defence spending that would contribute to development. A new submarine base should be established somewhere in our province as well. Unfortunately, a decision has been made against Stephenville as a site for the new Sea Cadet base for the Atlantic region.

[Senator Cochrane.]

In estimated figures provided by the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year 1984-85 it is interesting to highlight the numbers of military and civilians employed in the provinces and the dollars spent in each of the provinces and see how the figures compare for Newfoundland and Labrador.

Honourable senators, I realize that this will take a little time, but I feel it is important that I point this out to you.

Newfoundland—917 military were stationed there and 224 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $57,239,900.

Prince Edward Island—968 military were stationed there and 268 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $72,046,900. Approximately 1.2 times more defence dollars were spent in P.E.I. than in Newfoundland.

Saskatchewan—1,614 military were stationed there and 543 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $127,210,000. Approximately 2.2 times more defence dollars were spent in Saskatchewan than in Newfoundland.

New Brunswick—4,366 military were stationed there and 1,388 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $269,889,400. Approximately 4.7 times more defence dollars were spent in New Brunswick than in Newfoundland.

Manitoba—4,208 military were stationed there and 1,536 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $282,053,500. Approximately 4.9 times more defence dollars were spent in Manitoba than in Newfoundland.

Alberta—7,964 military were stationed there and 2,553 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $513,549,900. Approximately 8.9 times more defence dollars were spent in Alberta than in Newfoundland.

British Columbia—8,511 military were stationed there and 3,746 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $609,303,500. Approximately 10.6 times more defence dollars were spent in B.C. than in Newfoundland.

Quebec—10,163 military were stationed there and 4,946 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $700,451,800. Approximately 12.2 times more defence dollars were spent in Quebec than in Newfoundland.

Nova Scotia—11,788 military were stationed there and 5,620 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $949,883,400. Approximately 16.5 times more defence dollars were spent in Nova Scotia than in Newfoundland.

Ontario—22,555 military were stationed there and 12,449 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $1,700,887,100. Approximately 29.7 times more defence dollars were spent in Ontario than in Newfoundland.

The Yukon and Northwest Territories—466 military were stationed there and 33 civilians were employed. The total defence spending was $27,330,900.

Honourable senators, these figures speak for themselves. Out of the ten provinces we are tenth. Only the Yukon and Northwest Territories receive less than Newfoundland.

● (1540)

I will now turn to another important issue facing Newfoundland, and that is resources. Newfoundland and Labrador obviously has a resource-based economy, but it has very little control over some of those resources. With Labrador Hydro, Newfoundland will receive virtually no benefits for decades to come. Some way must be found to settle the long-standing dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec over the Upper Churchill Falls contract so that other rivers in Labrador with great hydro potential can also be developed.

In oil we have proven off-shore resources which Canada needs, and every effort should be made to bring those oil-fields into production as soon as possible.

But it is the fishery that is the biggest problem, challenge and hope for Newfoundland. We do not control our major resource. What if British Columbia did not control its forestry, Alberta its oil, or Ontario its mines? The recent Canada-France dispute points to the need for Newfoundland to have much more of a say over the resource that determines the livelihood of so many thousands of its people. Without a meaningful role in fishery policy we will always be at the whims of others who do not really understand the plight of Newfoundlanders and Labradorians who make their living from the sea. The Newfoundland and Labrador Royal Commission on Employment and Unemployment, which reported last fall, paid special attention to the role of the fishery in the province's economy and offered 20 recommendations on the fishery alone. The commission's major recommendation was as follows:

... a Canada-Newfoundland fisheries policy board, with strong directive powers, should be established to devise and implement fisheries policies for Newfoundland consistent with national resource management objectives.

Some such mechanism to provide effective concurrent jurisdiction in fisheries is an essential element in providing Newfoundland with some degree of control over its future economic development.

Concerning transportation issues, Newfoundland's Minister of Finance, the Honourable John Collins, recently appealed to the federal government for a renewed sense of urgency for the implementation and continuation of certain major projects, including the Trans-Labrador Highway and other provincial transportation needs. Given Newfoundland's location and geography, the province has special transportation problems. The Gulf ferry service needs to be improved to preserve our connection with the mainland, as well as our tourist industry, especially if transportation deregulation results in airline cutbacks.

The Trans-Labrador Highway is essential to the development of Labrador and will benefit all of Canada, not just Newfoundland and Labrador.

The Trans-Canada Highway is not built to the same standards as in the rest of Canada, and it is estimated that it would cost several hundred million dollars to bring it up to national standards. Newfoundland cannot afford to share the cost of that on a fifty-fifty basis. As with many other fifty-fifty cost-shared programs, there should be some recognition that our low fiscal capacity should be compensated by a better break on cost sharing.

In conclusion, I have tried to summarize briefly some of the major problems facing Newfoundland today. To deal with all of the major problems facing our province would be a lengthy, if not impossible, task to undertake at one time. The majority of these problems cannot be corrected by Newfoundland alone, but in most cases can be corrected with special help from the federal government. Certainly there have been tremendous benefits from Confederation, but very serious problems remain unresolved, and parity with the rest of Canada remains an elusive dream.

I believe in a strong Canada made up of strong healthy provinces where residents have the opportunity to decide for themselves whether they want to live or work there or go to some other province of their choice.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, many people from our poor provinces do not have that choice. A great many have to move away against their will, leaving family and friends behind. Our survival as a strong nation depends on the provinces' ability to make their own contribution. The people of Newfoundland do not want charity. We want to make a positive contribution to the well-being of our country and get rid of our status as a disadvantaged province.

Senator Frith: Well said, Senator Cochrane.

[English]

Senator Cochrane: As Premier Peckford would so poetically state, "Some day the sun will shine and 'have not' will be no more!"

Canada has an opportunity that few other countries have. It can virtually decide to eliminate the serious problems facing various regions of the country and has the resources to do so. However, history has proven that there are no quick-fix solutions. Many of these regional problems will be with us for many years to come, and it will take our combined resources and determination to overcome them. I am confident that the political will exists to address and overcome these regional disparities. I am quite pleased that this government has recognized—as previous administrations have—the need for closing the gap between the have and the have-not regions of this great nation, and that it has embarked upon a program to overcome some of these serious problems. Finding solutions to disparity is not a one-time effort; rather, it is an on-going process. In the years to come I hope that I can contribute to a better Canada by drawing attention to problems both regional and national in scope and by contributing to a collective search for solutions to them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered debated.

VETERANS AFFAIRS*SURVIVOR BENEFITS—ANOMALIES IN LEGISLATION—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 19, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to anomalies in veterans legislation regarding payment of survivor benefits to spouses of deceased prisoners of war.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that Bill C-100, which has to do with the spouses of deceased prisoners of war, has been introduced, it causes Inquiry No. 8 to be redundant, and I therefore ask that it be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

ROYAL ASSENT*ALTERNATIVE PROCEDURE—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On Motion No. 1:

By the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the present formal procedure of Royal Assent be retained and that it be used (a) at the request of the Governor General or of either House of Parliament and (b) at least once a session, for example at the prorogation of a session;

That, in addition to the present practice, a simpler procedure be established based on the following principles: (a) that the procedure involve representation from both the Senate and the House of Commons, (b) that it be public, and (c) that the declaration of Royal Assent be subsequently reported to both Houses of Parliament; and

That representatives of the Senate meet with representatives of the House of Commons to draft a resolution for a joint Address of both Houses to be presented to Her Excellency the Governor General praying that she approve such changes to the Royal Assent ceremony as described in this motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Motion No. 1, standing in my name, deals with the procedures for Royal Assent.

I had given a speech on this subject under an inquiry some years ago, and this motion deals with the same subject and the views I expressed then. It tries to catch up on some of the developments since then, including the activity of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate has advised me that the government may be preparing a bill dealing with the subject of Royal Assent. For that reason, although I have my notes ready or, as Senator Muir would say, "I have my music and I am ready to play!", I think a more appropriate concert setting might well be the debate on the bill, if it ever comes to us. For that reason I ask leave to withdraw my motion. I shall make my views known when the bill comes before us, if it ever does.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

POVERTY IN CANADA

SENATE REPORT ON POVERTY—POVERTY LINE UPDATE, 1986
PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I ask that the document which I tabled yesterday, being an update to 1986 on the poverty line, be printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of update see appendix, p. 2582.)

VISITORS IN GALLERY

PARLIAMENTARY INTERNS, ALBERTA LEGISLATURE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, may I draw to your attention the presence in our gallery of a group of young people from Alberta? They are the parliamentary interns from the legislature in Alberta who have been in Ottawa for a number of days now, watching and learning the federal structures. They are visiting the Senate this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONFERENCE, BANGKOK, THAILAND—
NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, the 3rd February 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-eighth Conference of the Inter-parliamentary Union, held in Bangkok, Thailand, from 12th to 17th October, 1987.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT CRISIS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that is probably more in the way of a request for some assistance. Ever since mid-December, when the government announced that it intended to make an additional amount of approximately $70 million available to assist people caught in the farm credit crisis, I have been attempting to find out the rules, regulations, criteria or formulae for people to apply for this assistance. So far I have been unable to obtain any information as to the criteria or where the applications for this assistance can be made, although I believe there are some farm credit review boards that will be playing a part in it.

However, there is a new element involved in the program in that the government has committed funds. I am not being critical of that, but I would like to know how to advise farmers in southern Alberta who are experiencing difficulties just where, how and under what conditions they can apply for assistance under the program or, to be more specific, for that part of the program that gives them an opportunity to have all or some of their debt reduced to 6 per cent.

UNITED STATES SUBSIDIES ON GRAIN EXPORTS—CANADA-U.S.
CONSULTATIONS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. When the Secretary of State for the United States was in Ottawa meeting with our Secretary of State for External Affairs some days ago, a report from the meeting was to the effect that the Americans were not moving on the whole question of acid rain. That, of course, is a very important subject.

However, I was disturbed that no reference came out of that meeting to continuing United States subsidies on the export of wheat and other grains. The deputy commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board is reported to have said just recently that if the Americans were to cease their wheat giveaways that very action would result in the price of wheat in Canada going up by $1 a bushel. For months I have been saying that, if the Americans were to quit that subsidy, within 72 hours our wheat would go up by $1 or $2 a bushel. That statement is really being confirmed by the deputy chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, Larry Christenson.

My question is this: Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs raise with the American Secretary of State this question of continuing American subsidies in the export field? If so, in what terms was it raised, and what was the reaction of Secretary of State Shultz?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, for some time we have been making representations on this matter, that is to say, the targeting of traditional Canadian markets by this United States program. Not only did we do so at the most recent meetings of Mr. Clark and Secretary of State Shultz but considerable detail was gone into by Mr. Clark and Mr. Shultz at their meeting in Brussels last October. This matter has also been the subject of representations—very strong representations—by our embassy in Washington. The ambassador, on behalf of the government, objected to recent U.S. targeting of the Soviet Union, China, Algeria and Iraq. There were meetings last month between Ambassador Gottlieb and the United States Secretary of Agriculture and the U.S. special trade representative Clayton Yeuter.

I simply place those instances on the record as an indication of the high importance that we attach to this matter and of our continuing representations bilaterally and our continuing activity multilaterally to give this issue priority.

Senator Argue: I am greatly disappointed, if I may say so, with that answer. The minister is very well informed and, judging from that answer, obviously the question of those subsidies was not raised when Secretary Shultz was here.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, as far as I know, made no mention at all of that subject either before or following his meeting with the American Secretary of State. That says to me, along with the answer from the Leader of the Government, that this matter was not raised.

My question was: Was it raised, and in what terms was it raised? Why was there no publicity attached to its being raised so that Mr. Clark could come out and report the reaction or the response? I think that is a legitimate question. In western Canada we think that these subsidies are important. They are important to us because they are hurting us; they are hurting the whole economy. Why was this question not raised at the meeting just a few days ago, if not last October?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator prefaced his statement by saying, "As far as I know, . . ." I think that covers a multitude of sins.

Senator Argue: The minister knows that the question was not raised—and the minister will not say that it was raised, because it was not raised. Now I can say that I have, I think, definite evidence that it was not raised. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has not said that it was raised.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF BARBARA ISMAN

Hon. Hazen Argue: I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I hear—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Is this another rumour?

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Argue: Yes, this is another rumour which I hope you will dispell.

Senator Murray: Go ahead.

Senator Argue: Just keep on interrupting. The leader is not doing very well today with his responses, but he can try this question.

The reports I hear, usually from well-informed sources, say that the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds) is considering the appointment of Barbara Isman, who has been the Executive Director, Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association.

Senator Barootes: That's pronounced "Izman".

Senator Argue: I always pronounced it "Iceman" when I met with her, and I was not corrected; but I have been corrected now. In any event, we will simply call her Barbara.

The people who have talked to me—and this rumour is very widespread—are opposed to the appointment of somebody to the Canadian Wheat Board from an organization that has been exceedingly critical and often opposed to the policies of the Canadian Wheat Board. The people who support the system of the orderly marketing of grain will be greatly disturbed if this report should have some substance.

So, I ask the leader to convey to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board that this would be a very inadvisable appointment.

I hope to receive some response. I say that because I think it is important to the orderly marketing of grain. The Canadian Wheat Board does a good job, and the commissioners should continue to be highly qualified people drawn from organizations that support the orderly marketing system and not from an organization that for many years has been totally opposed to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer is that responsible ministers do not comment on rumours.

Senator Argue: If the leader is not prepared to discuss this, that is fine, but is he prepared to convey this discussion to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, or, as he is now called, the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)?

Senator Murray: My colleague, the Honourable Charles Mayer, is an avid reader of Senate Hansard. I am sure he will take note of the honourable senator's representations.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF CONSUMER AFFAIRS MINISTER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if since yesterday the leader has had an opportunity to talk to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to find out if he is going to take any action because of drug prices being raised by 5 per cent and as much as 250 per cent over the past six months.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not believe I undertook to talk to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs along the line Senator Bonnell suggests. What I did undertake to do was to ask my colleague to furnish replies to those questions that were put by honourable senators during the course of yesterday's oral Question Period.

Senator Bonnell: I wonder if the honourable senator asked him if he was prepared to resign as Minister of Consumer Affairs. Would you convey that message to him?

Senator Doody: He is an avid reader!

Senator Bonnell: Apparently not, but there is not much sense in asking questions of our leader, because he does not convey the messages.

Senator Doody: Our "collective leader."

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING TO MAINLAND—STATUS OF MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he advise the Senate whether the Prime Minister of Canada has accepted the letter of the Minister of the Environment in which he says that he wants to resign from his duties as Minister of the Environment when it comes to the fixed link to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that matter is still under consideration by the Prime Minister.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, does the Leader of the Government in the Senate think that the Minister of the Environment can have certain duties concerning the environment in certain provinces, but have someone else look after the environment for other provinces—a kind of mixed portfolio?

Senator Frith: You must hear rumours too.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend will have seen the rationale—and it is an admirable one in personal terms—that my colleague, Mr. McMillan, put forward in making his request of the Prime Minister. Whether this will be accepted by the Prime Minister on administrative and policy grounds is a question for the Prime Minister to decide.

PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING TO MAINLAND—P.E.I. CONDITIONS PRECEDENT TO PREPARATION OF PROPOSALS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me if the Government of Canada has accepted the ten points that the Premier of Prince Edward Island laid down to the Honourable Stewart McInnes as being ten points that they would accept, look into and carry out before they would ask the contractors to prepare proposals for a fixed link?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess that I do not know the answer to that question; I have not seen the ten points to which Senator Bonnell refers. I am aware of the statements that were made by Premier Ghiz on the night of the plebiscite and statements that were quoted in the media a day or so afterwards, but I will ask my colleague, Mr. McInnes, whether there is any information that he can convey on that matter at this time.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE APPEARANCE OF DRUG COMPANY SPOKESMEN

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should also like to ask a question arising out of the answers that the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave yesterday to a series of questions that were put by a number of senators, including me. I asked him whether or not he would support a reference to a committee of the Senate so that we could recall the spokesmen from the pharmaceutical companies to find out what their position is now and to see if we could square that with the undertakings they gave when they appeared before the Senate committee and gave what we regarded as a firm undertaking that they would not raise prices more than the CPI.

I think I understood this yesterday too, but it is even clearer today, now that I can read what was reported in Hansard. I asked the minister if he would support that kind of action, and his reply was:

... the committee is master of its own procedures and can do that if it wishes to do so.

Further on he said:

... it is not my habit to interfere with the work of the committees.

I did not ask him to interfere with the work of the committees. He knows, and I know, from the experience that we have had here that if the leader of the party will support a proposition—in this case, a reference to a committee—the possibility of that taking place is raised significantly.

I ask him again today if he will support a reference to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee so that we can recall these witnesses from the pharmaceutical companies, who gave an undertaking that they would not increase drug prices in excess of the CPI, but who are obviously doing so now.

The minister responded yesterday that this was based on one report in the Globe and Mail. I can tell him now that I went to a prescription drugstore this morning. If he wants absolute, positive proof of increases in prescription drugs that are in excess of the undertakings given by the pharmaceutical companies, I am now prepared to give it to him. I am asking him if he will support a motion so that we can get to the bottom of this and find out whether these people will keep their word or not.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must observe that the government is outnumbered by more than two to one in this chamber. If my honourable friend wishes to bring forward a motion on behalf of his party to refer a matter to a committee, I suspect that he can do so in the full confidence that such a motion will carry in this place. I have absolutely no objection to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce convening to hear witnesses from the drug industry or anywhere else on this matter; no objection whatsoever. The one plea that I made to my friend yesterday was that he try to do so at the least possible cost, in view of the fact that the overall committee budget has been overspent by a rather considerable amount in the present fiscal year.

Senator Olson: I also have a supplementary question, which is: Why doesn't the minister answer the question? I did not ask him whether or not we could bring forward a motion and have it passed by this kind of majority. I asked him if he would support such a motion, because we have the evidence that there has been something of a deviation from a pledge or an undertaking that was given to the committee. Why doesn't he answer the question? I have asked him four times now. We want to know whether the people in government are going to support the Senate's getting down to finding out what the excuse is for exceeding these price increases.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already stated quite clearly that I have no objection to such an initiative on the part of the Senate, but the honourable senator, as an experienced parliamentarian and former minister, should know that it would be very imprudent of me to sign on, in advance, to a motion that has not yet been drafted, much less presented in this house.

Senator Olson: I can tell my honourable friend that there are several hundred thousands, and perhaps even millions, of Canadians who would like to know where the government stands on this issue, and I am giving him an opportunity to state that, but, if he chooses not to, then we will have to wait.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION AT MEETING

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a very low-key question!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: Watch out!

Senator MacEachen: It has to do with the information that a number of provincial ministers have been designated to participate in a particular meeting of the GATT. My recollection is that there are four such ministers. I know the Minister of Industry from Nova Scotia was one of those chosen.

I wonder how the selection was made. Did provincial governments decide among themselves who would go, or was it a designation by the Government of Canada?

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question fully. I would expect that the Governments of British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec would be the other three provincial governments involved. Certainly Ontario and British Columbia are most concerned with the issue that is being discussed.

There have been discussions with all of the provinces relating to the proposed GATT ruling and to the attempt the government is making to negotiate a settlement of the issue. Discussions have been held with all provinces on that matter. Whether the four provinces were designated by the federal government or selected by the ten, I just do not know.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

PUBLIC WORKS

CONTRACTS AWARDED IN PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 27 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

13th August 1987—What is the list of contracts awarded by Public Works Canada for the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 in the Province of Newfoundland by federal district under (a) location of contract; (b) successful tender with name of Company; and (c) amount of contract?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONERS TRAINING REGULATIONS

Question No. 37 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1st December 1987—Concerning the Pensioners Training Regulations (i) how many veterans are receiving benefits under these Regulations; (ii) are any applications pending; (iii) if yes, how long have they been on file; and (iv) what is the number of staff on strength who are responsible for Pensioners Training?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

- (i) 20 former Regular Force members
- (ii) No
- (iii) N/A
- (iv) 10% of one person year

AUDITOR GENERAL

ROLE UNDER ACT

Question No. 39 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Senator Leblanc (Saurel):

8th December 1987—With respect to the Auditor General Act, S.C. 1976-77, c. 34, why does the Act refer to the Auditor General's role in relation to the House of Commons only rather than to Parliament in general or specifically to both the Senate and the House of Commons?

Reply by the President of the Treasury Board:

The role of the Auditor General is described in sections 5 and 6 of the Auditor General Act. He is required to examine and report on the financial statements to be included in the Public Accounts.

Since under section 55 of the Financial Administration Act these Public Accounts are required to be laid before the House of Commons, it follows that the Auditor General's report on the Accounts would be similarly addressed.

Once tabled, both the Public Accounts and the related Report of the Auditor General are public documents which may be utilized by the House of Commons and the Senate in exercising their responsibilities.

Section 3.(1) of the Auditor General Act does recognize the responsibility of the Senate with regard to the removal of the Auditor General. It reads as follows:

3.(1) "The Governor in Council shall, by commission under the Great Seal, appoint a qualified auditor to be the officer called the Auditor General of Canada to hold office during good behaviour for a term of ten years, but the Auditor General may be removed by the Governor in Council on address of the Senate and House of Commons”.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1987

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-104, An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz has pinpointed for me the report I asked for yesterday. It appears at page 1701 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of December 10, 1987. As he assured us yesterday, it is, indeed, a favourable report on the study of this bill. Therefore, I would just ask him a couple of questions that he may answer in closing the debate.

First, I am not clear as to how the committee received this reference. I have the idea that there is something automatic about it; in other words, as Senator Nurgitz mentioned yesterday, there is some sort of regular program in this regard. I notice that he is nodding his head, so apparently I am right. Perhaps he can tell us exactly how that happened.

The fourteenth report states that the committee “examined the said document.” I note that it is called a document here rather than a bill, and I can understand why—the bill was not before us at that time. The report goes on to state:

—and now reports it with the following amendments:

Delete proposed clause 37.

As to proposed clauses 12 and 39, the report states:

Proposed clauses 12 and 39 should be deleted in accordance with the undertaking given by the Senior Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice . . .

As to proposed schedule I, item 8, the report states:

Proposed schedule I, item 8 should be amended in accordance with the undertaking given by the Senior Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice . . .

Finally, as to proposed schedule I, the report states:

Add new items 43 and 44 and renumber, in accordance with the undertaking given by the Senior Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice . . .

Can Senator Nurgitz assure us that those recommendations were all accepted and that they are incorporated in the bill that is now before us? Senator Neiman moved the adoption of that report and it was adopted by the Senate. Therefore, it seems clear to me that there is no need for its reference to committee. In addition, it seems to me that there is no need for further debate, provided that Senator Nurgitz can give us all of those assurances.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Nurgitz speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, as to how this matter was referred to the committee, as Senator Frith hinted, there is in place an ongoing program or an ongoing file of matters which will be written up into draft bills as soon as we have reached the point where it is possible to do that.

Senator Frith: That draft bill is the “document” that is referred to in the report?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. That draft bill is then referred, under the program, to the standing committees of the two chambers. That is how the bill is referred to committee. My recollection is that this brings current the statutes to the end of December. I notice that Mr. Lewis, the person responsible in the House of Commons for sponsorship of this matter, indicated that it was all bills that had to this date received Royal Assent. My authority for saying that is the House of Commons Hansard.

Those matters with respect to which either the House of Commons committee or the Senate committee recommended deletion or amendment have been so amended or deleted. We have been assured of this by counsel from the Department of Justice.

Senator Frith: All recommendations have been incorporated, then?

Senator Nurgitz: The recommendations have been incorporated in Bill C-104; I can give that assurance.

With that, honourable senators, I urge that we proceed with this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CURRENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-99, to amend the Currency Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-99 is outside the scope of my knowledge, but in view of the fact that they had to reach to the bottom of the barrel, I must take on this responsibility.

Senator Frith: We never let that operate as an inhibition around here!

● (1430)

Senator Marshall: It is a bill to amend the Currency Act and is of a technical nature. It pertains to the accounting practices of the Exchange Fund Account and is designed to ensure that they are consistent with the procedures followed in the Public Accounts of Canada. As honourable senators know, the Exchange Fund is a special account of the Minister of Finance. It is the principal repository of Canada's official international reserves and, as such, aids in the control and protection of the external value of our currency.

Since 1986 the Exchange Fund has been consolidated with the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the Public Accounts of Canada, and this revision to government accounting practices was based on recommendations by the Auditor General of Canada and was implemented with the February 1986 budget. The Exchange Fund nevertheless continues to exist as a distinct accounting entity and is governed by separate legislation, the Currency Act, which is the subject of the proposed amendment.

In determining the net income of the Exchange Fund, the Currency Act draws a distinction between regular investment income and valuation gains or losses. The latter, which are due to exchange rate changes and gold sales, are averaged over three years under the Currency Act, while they are recognized immediately in the Public Accounts consolidation.

The proposed amendment would eliminate this difference in accounting treatment which was created by the consolidation introduced in 1986. In particular, it calls for the repeal of the three-year averaging provision in the Currency Act and would require that the accounting conventions of the Exchange Fund be consistent with those of the Public Accounts.

I would like to note that the payment of income by the Exchange Fund to the Consolidated Revenue Fund is a book-keeping entry only; no cash is involved. That's why they gave it to me! The proposed amendment has no financial implications and will affect neither the operations of the Exchange Fund nor the government's fiscal position in any way. It is concerned solely with the presentation of the Exchange Fund's financial statements, serving to make them consistent with the presentation already contained in the Public Accounts and which follows recommendations made by the Auditor General.

Honourable senators, this bill passed in the other place within an hour and a half. Speeches were short, and opposition critics were in favour of the amendments. I therefore recommend the bill to honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CUSTOMS ORDERS VALIDATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-96, to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables.

[Senator Frith.]

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to introduce the Fruit and Vegetable Customs Orders Validation Bill. I hesitate to do so after all of the important matters that have been discussed today during Question Period; nevertheless, this is a necessity of housekeeping.

One of the principles of the Senate of Canada is, of course, that representatives should report carefully on the nature of important legislative business before the chamber. I will not claim that the Fruit and Vegetable Customs Orders Validation Bill deals with a truly weighty public matter. I would merely say that even appointment to high public office in this chamber does not mean that we can escape from dreary housekeeping duties.

In brief, the purpose of the bill is to regularize some transactions in the nation's grocery accounts. But before dealing with the legislation, perhaps I may supply some background. During the Canadian growing season the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, levies duties on imported fruit and vegetables. That is to say, we impose duties to protect the domestic growers during the harvest period. For the rest of the year imported fresh fruit and vegetables may enter Canada duty free. During the harvest season, however, Customs duty orders are made pursuant to paragraph 15(1)(a) of the Customs Tariff, which currently permits either the Minister or Deputy Minister of National Revenue to levy those duties.

During the period January 1, 1972, to January 10, 1985, Customs duty orders were signed by officers of the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, on the basis of a legal opinion which held that these orders were not statutory instruments and could be signed by the deputy minister or his designated officials. However, in June 1984 the department was advised that Customs duty orders are indeed statutory instruments, that they have to be signed by the Customs minister of the day, examined in accordance with the Statutory Instruments Act, registered with the Privy Council, and published in the Canada Gazette. Between June 28, 1984, and January 10, 1985, the minister signed most of the orders. However, in some cases signatures or registrations were delayed beyond the effective dates. Furthermore, in some instances officials signed orders cancelling duties that were authorized by them prior to the June notification of the possible mistake or irregularity in the original legal opinion. It follows, therefore, that all orders that were not signed by Ministers of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, since the beginning of 1972 to January 10, 1985, were not issued with undiluted statutory authority.

The secretary to the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments suggested that the department draft remedial legislation to validate the duty collection and remittance orders specified in the bill. In the committee's Fourth Report to Parliament, tabled on March 20, 1987—and our own Senator Nurgitz is joint chairman of this committee—they stated that the passing of validating legislation will cause the letter of the law to properly coincide with its spirit. The report also went on to recommend that Parliament adopt remedial legislation once it was introduced. It said that the legislation would be "proper and in keeping with the best traditions of parliamentary government."

Perhaps some honourable senators are mildly surprised that what I described as housekeeping could be characterized with such seriousness and gravity. Yet, it is merely recognition that form as well as substance sometimes demands our care. So, the bill is necessary if Customs administration is to work appropriately and consistently. My request for senatorial approval is based on the original intent of the Customs Tariff. Clearly the purpose of the tariff is to protect the public interest by ensuring stability in the supply of domestically grown produce. At the same time we encourage the importation of affordable fresh produce during the off-season.

To sum up then, the Fruit and Vegetable Customs Orders Validation Bill will validate retroactively the collection of seasonal Customs duties done without complete authority between January 1, 1972, and January 10, 1985. It will also deem the Customs duties on imported produce between June 28, 1984, and January 10, 1985, to have been remitted in full. Passing the bill will confirm our belief that Customs duties were collected in good faith and in compliance with what was considered to be valid subordinate legislation.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I would like to repeat for my colleagues a comment by Thomas Carlyle, that great 19th century English philosopher and writer. He said, "It is meritorious to insist on forms," because anything of substance clothes itself in that way. "Everywhere the formed world is the only habitable one," he continued. By using the word "habitable" he reminds us to take care of our housekeeping.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-91, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-91, an act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, called CALURA, is now before the Senate. This legislation, which was passed in 1962, involves the reporting of ownership and financial information relating to corporations and labour unions operating in this country.

The information collected under CALURA has been reported to Parliament annually and has proven to be a unique and highly valuable reference on the extent and effects of foreign ownership and control of corporations in Canada, and on the affiliation of Canadian with international labour unions.

Its prime objective was, and remains, to provide the government and the general public with objective information on corporate concentration and the extent to which parts of the Canadian economy are owned and controlled from abroad.

During more than two decades of existence CALURA has provided the most consistent, complete and detailed information on the financial structure and degree of foreign ownership of the Canadian economy. This is information that has served royal commissions, government departments and the academic and business communities. Its ownership series have been the basis for virtually all Canadian reports and articles, both public and private, on corporate concentration and foreign ownership of the Canadian economy.

The CALURA reports show clearly how the leading 500 non-financial enterprises accounted for more than half of all sales, two-thirds of all assets, and almost three-fourths of profits. Of the 500 leading enterprises just about half are foreign controlled.

United States controlled corporations account for 75 per cent of the sales and 85 per cent of the profits of foreign-controlled non-financial corporations. These facts are essential to any discussion of the corporate sector in Canada, including competition policy and trade negotiations. They can only be established from CALURA annual reports.

In addition, CALURA ownership information is available to the public through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Due to widespread demand, Statistics Canada has regularly produced a highly popular directory entitled "Inter-Corporate Ownership", which shows who owns and controls business in Canada. This publication has served many executives, market managers, investors, journalists and economists—and, indeed, parliamentarians—studying and writing on the corporate structure of the Canadian economy. Ownership data are also distributed electronically by private enterprise to banks, financial institutions and other corporations across Canada.

It is obvious that CALURA, during its two decades of existence, has proved absolutely essential in the analysis of economic affairs in Canada. I am sure all Canadians recognize the value of CALURA information and are pleased that this government's initiative to improve economic efficiency by reducing paper burden will not affect in any way the important data on the structure of Canadian industrial society provided by this legislation.

Those measures which this bill addresses relate purely to the administration of the legislation and the burden it has imposed on the business community. Equally important, there are justifiable concerns that very confidential information must remain solely under the purview of Statistics Canada.

In making all CALURA financial and technology transfer data confidential to Statistics Canada, business may feel reassured in responding under CALURA. At the same time, Statistics Canada will continue to supply policy departments non-confidential aggregates in support of the economic analysis of key policy issues.

In summary, this bill fulfills this government's commitment to alleviate the response burden by reinstating the corporate fiscal year for reporting, thus relieving many corporations from making time-consuming and costly adjustments to their financial returns.

It also gives business the assurance that it can file sensitive information under CALURA with absolute assurance of confidentiality. It does this while still supporting the government process of policy analysis on key industrial questions and leaving unaffected the public access to vital information on the ownership and control of Canadian corporate society.

No doubt some honourable senators will have questions concerning the working of this bill as amended, which I suggest might appropriately be addressed at the committee stage following second reading.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the sponsor of the bill in the Senate has quite correctly drawn a conclusion that there will be some questions raised from this side of the house concerning this bill in committee. Nonetheless, we agree with the government on the usefulness of the information provided by CALURA, and we are also in general agreement with the nature of the amendments provided.

However, it might be useful if I signalled some of the questions to which we would be interested in hearing responses in committee. But before doing that, I note that when this bill was referred to committee in the other place on December 15 last no witnesses were called, leaving questions that had been raised in the other place unanswered.

There may be questions raised by many senators in committee, but there are three that come to mind at once. The first deals with the information that is supplied by this bill on technology transfer and corporate concentration of ownership. Everyone is in agreement that this has been extremely useful data. We need to assure ourselves, however, that the data will continue to be available in a form that is useful in order to explore the kinds of questions that arise within the context of the trade talks in which this government is currently engaged.

The second area of questions will relate to the access to privileged information for policy purposes. Once again, the questions are in the same area. It has been suggested elsewhere that there is a study now under way related to the trade talks that arise from the CALURA data. The questions that come to mind are: Will that be possible? Will it be enhanced? Will it be diminished? These are questions that need to be put to a technical witness in this area.

The third area of questions concerns simplification, in which the government is taking a great deal of pride. For example, the questionnaire distributed to those people who respond to CALURA has been reduced from 16 pages to something much shorter. The same is true of the questionnaire on technology transfer. That seems to be a highly desirable move and, certainly on this side, we are in favour of reducing the paper burden for business, large and small, and for the unions.

However, there are questions on which we need reassurance. For example, one of the key uses of this data is the research which goes on in many places, but certainly within the academic community, on Canadian economy and Canadian business, on which historical continuity is of great importance. It may very well be that historical continuity is provided on these matters in the revised form of the reporting requirements for this bill, and indeed is provided elsewhere—for example, from National Revenue—but I think that is a question on which we need to reassure ourselves.

So, honourable senators, I suggest that when the bill is in committee we hear from witnesses who are capable of answering these kinds of questions and any others that may be referred to the sponsor of the bill in the meantime.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this afternoon we will be listening to three groups of witnesses. We await the arrival of the first.

Pursuant to order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. George Corn and Mr. Emilio Binavince were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: I would like to welcome to the Senate the witnesses from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council: Mr. George Corn, President, and Mr. Emilio Binavince, a member. They have supplied us with copies of their brief in both official languages, and these have been distributed to all members of the committee.

I would ask the witnesses to indicate to us who will be speaking or if they will both be speaking. I would like to remind the witnesses that we have set aside a maximum of one hour, and we will have to stay within that time limit, because we have other witnesses following.

Mr. George Corn, President, Canadian Ethnocultural Council: Mr. Chairman, I am a retired partner of Dunwood & Company, Chartered Accountants. For 15 years I was the president of the Czechoslovakian Association of Canada.

I would like to introduce Emilio Binavince. He is a lawyer with Gowling & Henderson here in Ottawa and a former professor of constitutional law at the University of Ottawa. He is a member of the United Council of Filipino Associations in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, we are pleased and honoured to be invited by the Senate committee to deliver personally our presentation at this hearing and to discuss with you our views on the 1987 Constitutional Accord. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council is a coalition of 36 ethnic national organizations which, in turn, represent over 1,000 provincial and local groups, branches and clubs, and tens of thousands of volunteers from coast to coast. We address the needs and concerns of approximately eight million Canadians from all ethnic groups in Canada. We are a non-profit and non-partisan coalition, dedicated to working together for the purpose of furthering the multicultural reality of Canada, recognizing bilingual and multicultural Canadian society, aiming for equal opportunity, rights and dignity, thus ensuring equity for all Canadians in one united Canada.

One of our main objectives is to entrench multiculturalism firmly in the Canadian legal system. Canada developed into a bilingual and multicultural country, and that fact has to be respected by all Canadians, incorporated into Canadian laws, and recognized in the Canadian Constitution.

We are here today to endorse the need for the accord, especially as it relates to Quebec. We believe that the people of Quebec were protected by the terms of the 1982 Constitutional Act. The lack of their voluntary signature was a most unfortunate absence in that otherwise positive historical development in our country.

The Canadian Ethnocultural Council welcomes the 1987 Constitutional Accord that will allow Quebec to be a full partner in Canadian Confederation. We have expressed our sincere congratulations to the Prime Minister and all provincial ministers for their effort and vision in arriving at the accord. The spirit of such unanimity was rare in the development of Canada and deserves praise. We were pleased that the accord, signed on June 3, 1987, ensured the sanctity of the multiculturalism clause of the Charter. We have studied the accord extensively and have expressed our view that so reflects Canadian reality—linguistic duality and multiculturalism should be recognized in the same clause of the Constitution or the Charter of Rights in order to receive equal interpretation in the future. When we met with the Prime Minister he was sensitive to our concerns and gave us hope that there would be room for improvements in respect of multiculturalism, and pointed out that there would be parliamentary hearings to consider changes.

We felt that after all hearings the First Ministers and Prime Minister should meet again to consider the results of these hearings and to discuss and implement improvements suggested by provincial and federal parliaments and interested groups such as ours.

We were encouraged when we read in the Throne Speech that:

It is imperative that Canada's multicultural and multiracial reality be integral to all facets of our national life to reflect the vital and distinctive nature of Canadian society.

● (1500)

It is our opinion that joining Quebec's signature to the accord should not override the interests of ethnic and linguistic minorities, rights of women and rights of native people.

I should now like to deal with some of the sections of the accord. I want to mention specifically our first recommendation. We believe that this country is fundamentally bilingual and multicultural. I believe all members of the committee agree with that. We therefore believe that both fundamental characteristics should be given equal protection in section 1 of the accord. Section 16 is not a satisfactory guarantee, although it was meant to be. What section 16 does is clarify that only the Charter will recognize multiculturalism and our cultural diversity, whereas the Constitution recognizes bilingualism. Our linguistic duality is, at this rate, above the multicultural aspects.

We support and endorse the concept of a distinct society in principle, and we recognize the necessity and importance of the inclusion of Quebec within the agreement. We also recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec primarily in its use of the Civil Code and in its being the main centre of French language and culture in Canada. We submit, however, that the distinctiveness of Quebec should not preclude the distinctiveness of other societies in Canada.

Second, we submit that it should not exclude Quebec from its obligation to maintain its own policy of multiculturalism. Whereas we recognize that it is not the intention of the accord as it is written, we recommend, to offset the possibility of these problems occurring, that the accord define the term "distinct society" and clarify that the Government of Quebec has the responsibility to preserve and promote the multicultural heritage of the province.

Sections 6 and 7 deal with the matter of immigration, and our two recommendations are intertwined. Our concern is that the federal immigration powers are being diluted in this accord. As a result, chequer-boarded immigration policies may result across Canada. As well, the method upon which agreements can be reached between federal and provincial ministers directly from one ministry to another circumvents Parliament and the general public. We feel that any agreement must be scrutinized by Parliament and the general public.

Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I turn to Mr. Emilio Binavince for further explanation.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Corn. Mr. Binavince, please proceed.

Mr. Emilio Binavince, Member, Canadian Ethnocultural Council: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. Because of the extensive nature of the recommendations made by the council I wish to make specific comments that would invite honourable senators to consider specifically our recommendations relating to section 2.

First of all, I should like to make a general comment to put this submission in perspective. As a constitutional professor I cannot resist the temptation of enlightening honourable senators a little on what a constitution is all about. A constitution provides the ground rules in the exercise of the collective power of the people that is delegated to governments.

In relation to the Meech Lake Accord, there are three important realities that people have to understand: the first is that the majority of the people, being represented in government, do not need the protection of the Constitution, generally. The majority has a sociological protection, and very often it does not need a constitutional protection.

Second, the Constitution, at its best, works when the morals and the wisdom of the people break down. It is intended to help channel the emotions of hysteria and panic. That is the reason constitutions work better when there is bad government, arbitrary government or other authoritarianism. The wise restraints that make men free are almost always better than written words.

The third point that is important to realize is that the Constitution is very simply an empty declaration unless we have courageous, wise and objective judges. An eminent Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Oliver Wendell Holmes, once said that the Constitution is what the judges say.

Out of these three points arise the concerns of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. There is no constitutional protection today of the ethnic culture in Canada. Section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is very simply a direction as to how the courts should interpret the Constitution; it is not a substantive grant of any right to the ethnic minorities in Canada.

Section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord recognizes the French culture and the English culture, the two mainstream cultures in Canada today. Being the majority culture they do not need the constitutional protection that is actually being put in the Charter. They have the strength of numbers, and that is the reason constitutions, in the ultimate analysis, are not needed. The sociological protection is enough. What a constitution must require is the protection of the ethnic cultural minorities, and that is exactly what is missing in the Meech Lake Accord.

Aside from that, section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord has given a window that can serve as a justification to bigoted courts or bigoted governments to limit the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

By being specific in relation to the English and the French cultures, one—especially the courts—can imply that the Constitution does not recognize any other cultures, because otherwise what is the purpose of being specific? That is a kind of distorted logic that, even in the hands of the courts or the government, could become a weapon to limit the multicultural character of the country—or probably even the liberties that are included in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

If, indeed, multiculturalism is protected by the Charter, why be very specific in the protection and preservation of the English and the French cultures? It is more dangerous to leave the ethnic or minority cultures naked of constitutional protection.

Section 2 can be taken as a fresh and original grant of a power that did not previously exist in the Constitution Act of 1867. In the hands of the wrong government that can be taken, as I said, to justify the limitations of liberty in the country, in the name, very often mistakenly, of the survival of one culture or for the purity of another culture.

The multicultural character of the country is not inconsistent with the recognition of the English and French culture in Canada. For that reason there is no reason to fear that an amendment to section 2, stating that one of the fundamental characters of Canada is multiculturalism, would be a dangerous proposition.

The next point relates to the vagueness of the concepts that are included in the Meech Lake Accord. Vague terms are dangerous to liberty, because they enlarge the ability of those who make decisions to justify certain kinds of interpretation that could limit the liberty of the people. The definitions of what are a distinctive characteristic of Canada and a distinct society in Quebec require an invitation for clarity, and if they are not clarified they can be distorted beyond the intent of the Fathers of the Constitution during the Meech Lake Accord, because in the ultimate analysis the judge's ability to make an oppressive decision plausible, to make it sound plausible under the words of the Constitution, is the true limit of constitutional interpretation. That is the reason why there should be certain clarity in the definitions of those two terms.

Finally—and this touches directly on the objectivity, wisdom and need for judges who have the courage to protect minority cultures—judges, as I have said before, are the ultimate interpreters of the Constitution. We believe, as is proven by sociological studies, that there is a cultural bias to wisdom, education and philosophy that is demonstrated in the interpretation of the United States Constitution. For that reason, in our view, judges across the country should have ethnic representations so that they will fully understand the psychological thinking and the emotion of the ethnocultural minorities in this country.

Moreover, the granting of the powers to the provinces to nominate Supreme Court Judges dilutes their accountability and destroys the unified responsibility for multiculturalism throughout the country.

For these reasons, honourable senators and Mr. Chairman, we support, and suggest to you that you should seriously consider, amending particularly section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord.

The Chairman: Thank you Mr. Binavince. Mr. Corn?

Mr. Corn: I should like to mention a few things from the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons.

Section 93 of that report states:

A number of representatives of Canadian ethnocultural organizations dedicated to the preservation and promotion of this multicultural heritage expressed their concern to the Committee that the "linguistic duality distinct society" rules of interpretation might have negative implications for the status of multiculturalism in Canada.

Section 97 states:

Few if any of the representatives of ethnocultural communities objected to describing linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada nor did any deny the importance of recognizing the distinctness of Quebec society within Canada. Their objection was to a definition of Canada that includes linguistic duality but does not speak of multiculturalism; that identifies Quebec's distinctness but is silent about other distinct elements in the Canadian mosaic—

To correct this omission they proposed to amend section 2 as it was described in the report.

The report goes on to state:

The Joint Committee fully agrees with the vital importance of our multicultural heritage but we do not share the concerns expressed with regard to the omission from section 2 of any mention of multiculturalism. Section 2(1)(a) does not purport to offer a comprehensive definition of Canada. It is, as we have indicated, an articulation of one of the fundamental characteristics of Canada. Had first the ministers attempted to formulate a comprehensive definition that captured all of the fundamental characteristics of Canada they would have gone far beyond their agenda of dealing with amendments necessary to enable the Government of Quebec to give its willing assent to the Constitution.

The committee also agrees that... the determination of ethnocultural groups to ensure that recognition of Canada's linguistic duality and of Quebec's distinct society does not override recognition of our multicultural heritage. That, we believe, is the intent of section 16 of the Accord.

We see no reason to doubt that the First Ministers, all of whom expressed strong support for multiculturalism, will address this topic in their further constitutional discussions and we have no hesitation in recommending that the topics be added to their agenda at one of their forthcoming conferences.

I would also like to mention that the other political parties issued minority reports. The NDP minority report also recognized the importance of our concerns, but said that they should be addressed at a future round.

The Liberal minority report most accurately reflected our concerns. They recommended an addition to section 1 that would recognize the multicultural nature of the Canadian society, and they recommended that section 16 be amended to protect the entire Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council feels that it is still possible to amend section 2, the recognition of multicultural Canada, and that it should be addressed by the First Ministers.

If this is not possible, we feel that at least the agenda for the future First Ministers' Conference should be amended and multiculturalism should be included in section 13 of the accord.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to assure you that one of the most important goals of CEC, the organization mentioned here as representing thousands of regional and local groups, and so on, is to have multiculturalism embodied in the Canadian Constitution, the reality which reflects the fabric of Canada and the unity and diversity of Canadian society.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Corn and Mr. Binavince. We will now go to questions from members of the committee. I have Senator Marsden first, to be followed by Senator Stewart.

Senator Marsden: I wish to thank the witnesses for appearing today and for their useful testimony—both in what they have said for the record this afternoon and in their written brief.

Mr. Chairman, may I assume that the written brief will be appended to the documentation for this afternoon's session?

The Chairman: I do not believe it has been the practice, Senator Marsden, to have the briefs appended as part of the documents. It is a matter of the number of briefs that we would have to print. But, as you know, the briefs have been distributed to all members of the committee.

Senator Marsden: Let me put it into the record, then, that I think the written brief was useful and is worth re-reading.

I have two short questions for clarification.

In your written brief and in what you have said this afternoon you mentioned the guarantees of women's rights in addition to the particular concerns that you are raising here this afternoon. In your executive summary you state: "... to ensure better guarantees of women's and aboriginal rights." Many people in this country are of the view that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does provide strong guarantees of women's equality. Are you suggesting that that should be improved or that the paramountcy of the Charter should prevail in the Meech Lake agreement?

Mr. Binavince: We are concerned that the Meech Lake Accord has the ability to override the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We agree that sections 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms grants protection to women, but, unfortunately, the Meech Lake Accord, in view of section 2, would allow governments to override and desist.

I am aware that Professor Lederman and Mr. Fortier, in testifying before the committee of the House of Commons, stated that that fear was paranoid and that we should not be afraid of the accord. The concern is very simply this: If it is only paranoia, there is one way of appeasing the people: Women and aboriginals, as well as the Ethnocultural Council, feel that it should be spelled out to ensure that the fear does not need to exist.

• (1520)

Senator Marsden: On your recommendation that the distinct society concept be defined in the accord, may I ask if you have a definition to propose or if there is a definition that you absolutely dislike? For example, La Fédération des Femmes du Québec, in testifying before the joint committee, took a definition from the so-called beige paper. Is that one that you like or do not like?

Mr. Binavince: I, personally, feel that it is not a problem of definition but is a problem of vagueness. I think that we could all live with some kind of definition, if it were given now and we could improve it in the future. However, it is undemocratic to leave it as vague as it is now and to delegate the courts or the governments of the future to provide an interpretation, which would be subject to tremendous political pressure or even court litigation.

What is essential in constitutional law-making is to debate the issues and to decide. Ethnic minorities in Canada are willing to accept any kind of definition provided that the uncertainty is removed.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Corn: You were talking about a definition of "distinct society." We feel we should leave it to Quebec to state what is meant by that and that we should consider it. We feel that it is better that they, rather than we as outsiders, try to specify what it means.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marsden. The next questioner will be Senator Stewart, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Stewart: I have two questions; the first one has been anticipated somewhat by Senator Marsden. It relates to the expression "distinct society." I am hoping that Mr. Binavince will be helpful with regard to this expression because of his experience as a constitutionalist.

It is complained that this expression, "distinct society," is very vague and that it has no generally accepted meaning, at least in common law. Is that accurate? Is it not true that the expression "society" has a long and honourable meaning in the history of what is sometimes called "natural law jurisprudence," and that normally the expression "society" in that context means a group of associates who normally would proceed to become what was called a "civil society?" In other words, if you were a genuine society, you would be entitled to your own distinct, separate and independent government. Is that not an accurate history of at least 500 years of natural law jurisprudence? Wouldn't you, if you were a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, have to take into account that long and honourable tradition of interpretation?

Mr. Binavince: The amount of material that one has to study in order to give meaning to the word "distinct," not simply the word "society," is probably impossible to enumerate today.

The point concerns not so much the ability of defining something. I am absolutely certain that we can define anything and that the courts will ultimately give us the definition that they feel like giving. The problem concerns the considerations that will go into the definition, and constitutionalizing it, by way of the decision or the authority of the court, is ultimately a decision of the people. This is an opportunity for the Canadian people to define the term and to define themselves. We should not be afraid of doing that. If there is any difficulty in doing that, then at least we should make an attempt to provide some guidelines in that search for a definition.

For instance, in section 1 of the Charter there is at least a standard of reasonableness—the question of how it will be justified in certain other societies, and so on and so forth. I can think of language and religion, for instance, as being two elements of a distinct society. The question relates to the exclusion of other elements which will go to the distinctiveness. It is not a question of whether we are afraid of a future definition. You can only be afraid of a fact. There is an opportunity to do this now, and an enlightened debate can contribute to that, because, after all, constitution—making is the people's job, but we are not doing that today.

Senator Stewart: We are told that we are being paranoid when we ask for definition, and that really this is a very innocuous expression and that everyone who drives through the province of Quebec knows that it is a distinct society and that that is what it means. I am suggesting to you that that kind of assurance is really unfounded, and that the term could be interpreted as having great importance, and so interpreted, not by some wilful, irrational judge but, rather, by a judge taking cognizance of a wide body of jurisprudential literature.

Mr. Binavince: As we said, it is not the man on the street, driving through Quebec, who will give the definition. When I walk down the streets of Montreal I can see things which make me say, "That is Quebec. It is beautiful." I can assure you that another person with a different kind of philosophy and a different racial and cultural background might read more into it than I would.

The question very simply is: Whose view will become the language of the Constitution?

Senator Stewart: I now come to my second question, which concerns the quotation from Oliver Wendell Holmes that a constitution is what the judges say it is.

Perhaps I ought to preface this question by saying that senators are sometimes a little bit uneasy in this day and age when they are reminded that they are merely appointed. Are you satisfied to have the judges, who are going to say what the constitutional law of this country is, merely appointed, and, moreover, are now to be nominated under the Meech Lake arrangement by provincial premiers, their nominations being confirmed by the authorities in Ottawa? Does it seem suitable to you that this kind of constitutional law-making power—for that is what it is according to Holmes, who was an experienced man in this field—should be lodged in the hands of persons not only appointed but appointed by this particular process?

Mr. Binavince: I will probably be giving you a personal view rather than the council's view in answer to that question, because I do not think that the council has debated that very difficult question.

My personal view on that is that judges will have to be appointed. I do not think that the American way of electing judges will work. The only question in my mind is: Who should appoint them, and what kind of checks should be in place so that the objective, the wise and the qualified will be enthroned to tell us what the Constitution is? I think that a group of senators having the responsibility to examine the qualifications of nominees would be a good idea. Whether the Senate should be appointed or elected is another sort of question.

● (1530)

My fear is that the Quebec input under the accord—which is a substantial input given to the premiers of Quebec—will balkanize the appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and will encourage regionalism rather than the making of a Canadian society. There is room, of course, for that, but it is not a question of whose power it should be. We are afraid that there will be a dilution of responsibility. Unfortunately, we often look at the appointing power as the authority to whom we are accountable. If the triggering power resides in one province, it is unavoidable that the thinking of the appointed person will have a term of reference simply directed towards that province.

The culture of Canada is a national one; the distinct society of Canada is a national one; the fundamental characteristic of Canada is a national one. It is our submission that, in the ultimate analysis, we should test those perspectives of appointees.

Senator Stewart: My last question does not relate specifically to multiculturalism but is parallel to it. Under the Meech Lake Accord at least three judges will be nominated by the Province of Quebec. As a Nova Scotian I anticipate that the Province of Ontario will demand at least equal treatment. That does not leave very many for the rest of us, if you take either the four eastern provinces alone or the four western provinces alone. Does not the appointment process that is now being adopted tend not only to balkanize the court but to have the effect of concentrating this constitutional law-making body into two provinces?

Mr. Binavince: Senator, I, personally, share that view. I think if one looked at what is happening to the Supreme Court of Canada today one would see that that court is becoming more and more a constitutional public law court because of its power to select the cases that it will hear. That court considers issues of national importance and allows only such cases to be appealed. On the other hand, the direction of the appointment of judges is going towards the provincial powers. I am not so sure that that is a wise move. It is a step backwards.

Ultimately, the increasing tendency of our judicial development will be that the provincial courts will become supreme courts in their own right in certain provincial aspects of the law, and it is likely that many of these cases will not ever reach the Supreme Court of Canada. Only cases of national importance that should be decided by nationally conscious judges should go to the Supreme Court. That is my view.

Mr. Corn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention that the Canadian Ethnocultural Council advocates both the appointment of the Senate and the appointment of the Supreme Court of Canada. We, however, are not politicians; we are not partisan; we would like to leave it to the politicians whether the Senate be elected or appointed. That is their problem, not ours. We want only one thing, please: Appoint more people from ethnocultural backgrounds both to the Senate and to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is all we want.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Corn, but I think that Mr. Binavince indicated that he was answering on a personal basis as a constitutional expert and was not necessarily binding the Ethnocultural Council to his answers. However, we note your comment.

Senator Frith: Gentlemen, my question arises out of Senator Stewart's earlier line of questioning. I am not quite clear on your position with respect to the matter of "distinct society." You are familiar with the reference books that deal with words that are judicially defined. One can find out from such reference books what words and phrases have actually been defined by judges. The word "society," apparently, has never been in any context the subject for judicial definition in Canada. As I pointed out on another occasion, when I tried to find judicial definition of the word "society" I could find nothing between the words "soap" and "sodomy." I thought I heard you say that the building of a constitution and the definition of words of this kind was a matter for the people; yet, in your Executive Summary I note that the Canadian Ethnocultural Council wishes "to have the term 'distinct society' defined in the Accord." Is there a difference between the two of you on this subject?

Mr. Corn: We were speaking ostensibly about "distinct society." I would put it briefly. We do not believe that we ethnocultural people or English people should describe what is the distinct society of the French Canadians. I believe that they should do it.

Senator Frith: You believe what?

Mr. Corn: I believe that the French Canadian people, the Quebecers, should do it. We know certain aspects of their society; we know that their laws are based upon the Napoleonic Code while ours are based on case law; we know that they have a different language, and so on. But rather than try to describe what we feel is their distinct society, we would say that they should do so.

In the Throne Speech and elsewhere reference is made to our national life reflecting the vital and distinctive nature of Canadian society. Everybody is using distinctiveness. We, as an ethnocultural group, believe that we are distinctive. I am Czech by origin—I am something special! But who can say what is my distinctiveness? We believe that the Quebecers should try to establish what is distinctive in their case.

Senator Frith: You will remember that the proposed Constitution amendment states that:

The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) — and I will come back to that, and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

You seem to be saying that Quebec does constitute a distinct society, but so do other groups. Are you saying that, because there are other distinct societies within Canada, Quebec should not be singled out? Or are you saying that, because there are other distinct societies within Canada, they should all be included in the Constitution amendment? I am not clear on your position. You understand that we have to take into consideration the representations made by you and others. It would be neither expected nor helpful of us simply to say, to quote you, "We recommend that the term 'distinct society' be defined in the Accord." We would have to say how. Therefore, what I am trying to find out from you is: Do you think that we should take out the statement that Quebec is a distinct society, because there are other distinct societies, or do you suggest that we should add those other distinct societies and say that the Constitution should be interpreted on the basis of Quebec being a distinct society, of so and so being a distinct society, and so on? Should we take it out, leave it in, define Quebec more clearly, or add the others? What is your recommendation?

Mr. Corn: We feel that it should stay as it is. Quebec should elaborate what it is and what it means, and multiculturalism should be added in section 2. Quebec is a distinct society, but there are many other distinct societies. It would mean that there are other distinct societies which are recognized on the same level.

Senator Frith: Then your answer is that we should recommend the section to read:

The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with . . .

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society, that so and so constitutes within Canada a distinct society, that such and such within Canada constitutes a distinct society, . . .

and so on. Is that how you think we should do it?

Mr. Corn: No. I do not believe that those kinds of changes should be made. Let us accept Quebec as being a distinct society, and let them establish some kind of formula on what it is, or specify it. By adding multiculturalism, then multiculturalism, by a kind of back door, automatically comes into other distinct societies. But I would not like to see in the act many distinct societies. That cannot be done.

Mr. Binavince: As I understand the council, there is no fundamental objection to the question of Quebec's being a distinct society. The only question concerns the definition. It is the feeling of the council that Quebec can best define what kind of society it is. That is why our recommendation does not touch on section 2(1)(b). All that it proposes is a paragraph that will address the question of fundamental characteristics. The council accepts that Quebec is a distinct society, and when the time comes when we have to decide how that should be defined, in our submission, the people of Quebec are best qualified to tell us what kind of society it is; and they should come forward, if they want to put it in, in order to make it more explicit in section 2. We have no way of offering to you a definition. The suggestion the council is making as a practical amendment is addressed to section 2(1)(a), namely, that one of the fundamental characteristics of Canada is multiculturalism. It is not only what is contained under (1)(a).

Senator Frith: I will come back to (1)(a) in a moment. So far as (b) is concerned, you say that—

The Chairman: Senator Frith, I do not want to cut off your questions, but I should point out that I have three other senators who wish to speak, and our time is short. Perhaps you could make your question concise. Please finish your questioning.

Senator Frith: I am trying to make it concise. A precise question is shorter, but so is a precise answer.

The Chairman: But I have a time problem.

Senator Frith: I understand that. Let me ask a question concerning (a). It will be a fairly precise question, but I cannot guarantee the precision of the answer, of course. Section 2(1)(a) says:

(a) the recognition—

This is another way in which the Constitution has to be interpreted:

—that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec—and so on

—constitutes the fundamental characteristic of Canada;

I understand that you do not feel that that is a proper or sufficiently full definition of what is the characteristic of Canada. The Honourable Charles Caccia agrees with you, and he appeared before us with a definition that he felt would be a better description of contemporary Canada than is contained in section 2(1)(a). My precise question is: Do you know about that definition and do you agree with it?

Mr. Corn: Quite frankly, senator, I read what Mr. Caccia said, but I cannot recall everything exactly. But I know that when I read it I agreed with him basically.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. Honourable senators, I have three names on my list: Senators Bosa, Argue and Haidasz. We should be coming to the next group of witnesses in about five minutes. Therefore, I ask my colleagues to limit their questions. I now call on Senator Bosa.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, I will try to be as brief as possible. I am not sure whether it was Mr. Corn or Mr. Binavince who made reference to section 27 of the Constitution Act, 1982, stating that there was no substance in that section regarding multiculturalism. I was one of two people who fought very hard for that section. I refer to Mr. Laurence Decore, the present Mayor of Edmonton. I was surprised to hear that reference made. Could you elaborate a little on that?

Mr. Corn: I would say only that at the time the act was introduced during the term of Prime Minister Trudeau there was nothing in it about multiculturalism. One of the first actions of CEC was to include multiculturalism. When the first report came out, and there was nothing in it about multiculturalism, we wrote immediately to the Prime Minister and all premiers, and a catch-up clause was developed, and so on.

Mr. Binavince: I would like to read section 27, which emphasizes my point. It says:

This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

That is a directive to the courts. What the Constitution is really saying is that when you read section 2, section 7, or any other section, you should interpret it in such a way that multiculturalism will be preserved.

Senator Bosa: In other words, you would feel better if there were an act of Parliament that included the particulars and characteristics of multiculturalism, to which the judges could make reference.

Mr. Corn: Multiculturalism should be included in section 2: bilingual and multicultural Canada.

Senator Bosa: Recommendation 3 in your brief recommends that the wording in section 16 be substituted with the following:

Nothing in this Accord affects the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

There is no mention of multiculturalism here.

Mr. Corn: It is in another recommendation. There are three recommendations; this is the last one, the catch-up clause.

Senator Bosa: Then this is just an abbreviated form of what is contained in another section of your brief.

Mr. Corn: That is right.

Senator Bosa: Section 16 of the Meech Lake Accord refers specifically to sections 25 and 27, which I thought would reinforce that particular aspect of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Mr. Binavince: The purpose of recommendation number three simply tracks the position of the women's group, because there is the fear, which we share, that because of section 2 there is the possibility of the Charter becoming subordinated to the Meech Lake Accord. It should be made clear that the Charter is really the apex of constitutionalism. The Meech Lake Accord is just a finishing touch in the whole attempt. Because of the danger of interpretation we subordinate the Meech Lake Accord to the Charter.

● (1550)

The Chairman: Senator Argue and then Senator Haidasz. I would remind the honourable senators of my request.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, we have had presented to us this afternoon on behalf of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council a comprehensive and very important document. I would like to ask either Mr. George Corn or Mr. Emilio Binavince this question: In light of the many and substantial recommendations you have made for changes to the Constitution, how do you feel about your chances of getting many of them through, considering the unanimity clause that is currently in effect? Does that clause not make the adoption of these recommendations almost impossible for the foreseeable future?

Mr. Corn: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer this question. We devoted our time and study to trying to improve the accord. It is up to you to make the decisions as to what you will accept and what you will not accept. We believe that it can be done, but you must make the judgment as to whether or not it can be done. If it can be done, then we would ask you to support our recommendations. If it cannot be done, then we are still welcoming Quebec into our Constitution as it exists.

Senator Argue: I think we can support in general the important propositions you have put before us. Given all the difficulties that exist under the Meech Lake Accord, and given the unanimity clause—and you say that it is our responsibility and not yours to push the recommendations through, and I appreciate your point—would you not, really, breath a sigh of relief if, after the three-year period, the accord were not ratified and you could go back to where you were before and take your chances with the seven-out-of-ten formula rather than the current formula? Would it not be easier to get seven provinces in to line as opposed to ten?

Mr. Binavince: I am not very knowledgeable in the science of the practicality of getting matters such as this through. If I were orchestrating the effort to push the accord through with this long list of recommendations it would likely invite a rejection of the whole thing because of the impracticality of considering all of them. Given the number of recommendations, one might take the position that the entire Meech Lake Accord is wrong. It would have been nice for practical reasons to zero in on one or two recommendations. However, the purpose of the council is simply to educate those who have the ability to make decisions. We hope that along the way, while you are considering all the practical questions, you will be able to select what is important. What we did today was simply highlight what we think are the two important items—that is, section 2 and the appointing power with respect to judges. That does not preclude anyone who would like to sponsor particular aspects of our recommendations from doing so and attempting to get them through the negotiations. We believe that it will become more difficult in the future to change the Constitution.

Senator Argue: You have pointed out that you would like your share, the multicultural share, of Senate appointments. You say that such appointments constitute 15 per cent of the appointments now made and that you would like to see it go to 33 per cent, which is a difference of 18 per cent.

My question is in two parts. First, are there some groups in the multicultural community who you think should be represented in the Senate—perhaps Ukrainian people, other East Europeans, Asians, people from the Middle East or Africa, or other particular groups in the Caribbean, Central and South American countries?

The second question is: If there were 18 appointments in the Senate, the Prime Minister or the premiers in making their decision would go to the people you represent. Would you be favourable to the minorities amongst the minorities—your minorities—getting some extra recognition? In other words, instead of the possibility of a large ethnic minority getting two or three appointments, the appointments would be divided up so as to have as much representation of ethnic people in the Senate as possible. Would you agree with me when I say that, if that were done, it would greatly add to the unity and efficacy of Parliament and the unity of the country?

Mr. Corn: I agree with you.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To be precise and concise, can you, Mr. Corn, state on behalf of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council today whether the recently tabled multiculturalism bill meets, in part or in whole, with the recommendations you have put forward this afternoon regarding the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Corn: I would say that the bill as it was tabled satisfies or incorporates many of the submissions we made to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Multiculturalism. However, it does not go far enough. There are two basic faults with the bill. We want a separate department and we want a commissioner. We believe that a commissioner or coordinator, who is independent and who reports directly to Parliament, should be appointed.

Senator Haidasz: Someone like the Commissioner of Official Languages?

Mr. Corn: Yes. We are not worried about the title, but it should be an official appointed by order in council reporting directly to Parliament.

Senator Haidasz: Did your council ever discuss whether your goal of achieving greater representation in the Senate for ethnic minorities would be better achieved by an elected Senate or by an appointed Senate, as it is now?

Mr. Corn: Mr. Chairman, we discussed the matter. However, we did not spend much time on it, because we accepted the fact that we are non-partisan. We are not political. We would like to leave this matter in the hands of the political parties, because whatever we say will be wrong. We do not want to be so wrong.

Senator Haidasz: Since Confederation the Senate has not achieved the desired ethnic representation. Do you think an elected Senate would guarantee more representation?

Mr. Corn: We believe that it would.

Senator Haidasz: An elected Senate?

Mr. Corn: Yes. However, we have not spent enough time studying the matter; so we cannot say one way or the other.

Senator Haidasz: How many elected Slovaks or Filipinos do you have in the House of Commons?

[Senator Argue.]

Mr. Corn: If we go to the recent election in Ontario, ethnic representation has increased. Twenty-eight people of ethnic origin were elected to the Legislature of Ontario. That is a big sweep, but we do not want to speculate.

Senator Argue: Liberal democracy!

Senator Haidasz: In the appendix to your presentation is a letter from Mr. Malicki, former or present president of the Canadian Polish Congress. Are his views the official views of the Canadian Polish Congress or his personal views?

Mr. Corn: These are his personal views and not his views as president of the Canadian Polish Congress.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you very much. I hope you will also present your brief to the provincial legislatures that are studying the Meech Lake Accord, because they will also have a say in this matter.

The Chairman: Senator Haidasz, I am afraid your time is up.

Senator Haidasz: I have no more questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Corn: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Mr. Corn, I wonder if you could turn the microphone towards you. We are having some difficulty with the sound system.

Mr. Corn: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think that is better now.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I would like to stress that our immediate and most important goal is to firmly entrench multiculturalism in the Canadian Constitution. The unity in diversity of the Canadian society is the reality of Canada today.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to state that the Constitution cannot be imposed on the people. The Constitution must express the concerns of all Canadians—be they anglophones, francophones, ethnics or aboriginal peoples. We all want to live together in harmony, peace, freedom and democracy. We want to respect each other; we want to tolerate each other.

We continue to view Canada as a land of opportunity, prosperity and happiness. We want to contribute our share towards building the Canadian way of life for our children and all future citizens of Canada.

We therefore ask your support for at least some of the recommendations that have been presented to you today.

The Chairman: I thank you very much, Mr. Corn and Mr. Binavince, for appearing before us today. As you saw, there were many questions, and we could continue for much longer, but time is short. Thank you for coming.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Joseph J. Wilder, Q.C., and Mr. Manuel Prutschi were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Our next witnesses are from the Canadian Jewish Congress. To begin with, I believe we will be hearing from Mr. Joseph Wilder, the national chairman of the Joint Community Relations Committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress, together with Mr. Manuel Prutschi. I trust that the members of the committee will permit me to express a particular word of welcome to Mr. Wilder, since he is another Manitoban. Therefore, from one Manitoban to another, I may say how pleased we are to see you here today.

I understand that there will be other witnesses appearing as well on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and we will ask you to explain exactly how you wish to proceed, Mr. Wilder. We do not have a brief from you, but I presume that you will have an introductory speech. You understand that thereafter we will be conducting a question period. We have allocated an hour for the whole process.

Mr. Joseph J. Wilder, Q.C., National Chairman, Joint Community Relations Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. You are very kind.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, my name is Joe Wilder, and I appear here as a vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress—

The Chairman: I am sorry, Mr. Wilder, but there seems to be a technical problem with the sound system. We hear you clearly at times and at other times not at all.

Mr. Wilder: Mr. Chairman, would you like me to speak from one of the empty desks in the meantime?

The Chairman: Very well, we will proceed in that fashion.

Mr. Wilder: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thought I would take advantage of the opportunity, since I am sure it is the closest I will get!

Senator Perrault: It isn't worth it, Joe!

The Chairman: One never knows, Mr. Wilder; there are now provincial appointments.

Mr. Wilder: I understand.

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that I appear here as a vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress from Manitoba and as chairman of the Joint Community Relations Committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress. With me at the table is Mr. Manuel Prutschi, national director of the Community Relations Committee. In a moment I propose to introduce two of the members of our Constitutional Subcommittee who will make the actual presentation to you.

For those of you who may not be aware, the Canadian Jewish Congress was founded in 1919 and is the democratically elected representative organization of Canada's 350,000-strong Jewish community. It is organized into a federated structure of eight regions: Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Pacific and National Capital Region.

The aims and objectives of the Canadian Jewish Congress include the following: to develop the highest standards of citizenship in the Jews of Canada by encouraging, carrying on and participating in activities of a national, patriotic, cultural and humanitarian nature in furtherance of the best interests of the country and of the Jewish people; secondly, to act in matters affecting the status, rights and welfare of Canadian Jewry.

In pursuit of its aims and objectives Congress has made numerous representations to government and intervened in legal proceedings on such matters as anti-discrimination laws, racial restrictive covenants, religious education in the public schools, anti-hate laws, civil liberties and civil rights, education, religious rights, minority rights, treatment of the elderly, the needs of the handicapped, the status of women, refugees, the Canadian Constitution, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and domestic peace and security.

Canadian Jewish Congress last made a submission on the Constitution in 1980. The contribution of the Select Committee of Congress on the Canadian Constitution, chaired by Professor Maxwell Cohen, has been recognized as substantive and significant.

The accord signed by the First Ministers in June of last year addressed the very basic character of the Canadian system. Canadian Jewish Congress remains as interested as ever in expressing its views on Canada's evolving Constitution. It is our hope that through this present brief we once more can make a useful contribution to a discussion which should be of benefit to all Canadians.

Our Constitutional Subcommittee is chaired by John I. Laskin, and among its members are a number of constitutional experts in Canada. The subcommittee members are: Mark S. Anshan; Ann Bayefsky; Neil Finkelstein; John B. Laskin; Eric Maldooff; Daniel Morris; Manuel Prutschi; Les Scheininger; Donald Schwartz; Stephen Allan Scott.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce Professor Ann Bayefsky and Neil Finkelstein, two prominent Canadian constitutional authorities, to deliver the oral brief on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Professor Bayefsky is an associate professor at the University of Ottawa where she teaches constitutional law. She is the co-editor of the work Equality Rights and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is the author of the up-coming Canada's Constitution Act of 1982 and Amendments—A Documentary History.

Neil Finkelstein is a partner at Blake, Cassels, Graydon, specializing in constitutional and competition law. He was formerly a law clerk to the late Chief Justice Bora Laskin and served as senior policy advisor to the Honourable Ian Scott, Attorney General of Ontario. A teacher of constitutional law at Osgoode Hall and the University of Toronto, Mr. Finkelstein's extensive publications include authoring the Fifth Edition of Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, our written submission in both official languages will be delivered to this body shortly. At this time I would like to introduce Professor Bayefsky and Mr. Finkelstein.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Neil Finkelstein and Professor Ann Bayefsky were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: I would like to welcome the witnesses. Let us try the sound system and find out if it is now working. Will you both be speaking this afternoon?

Mr. Neil Finkelstein, Member, Constitutional Subcommittee on Meech Lake, Canadian Jewish Congress: I will be giving the initial presentation and then we will both be answering such questions as honourable senators might have.

The Chairman: You were observing the previous witnesses and you saw that there can be lengthy questioning. I trust that you will leave time within the time allocated for those questions.

Mr. Finkelstein: Honourable senators, the Canadian Jewish Congress will be restricting its submissions to three areas. Those areas are: the duality distinctiveness clause; the provisions with respect to the Supreme Court of Canada; and the provisions with respect to immigration.

With respect to the duality distinctiveness clause, a free and democratic society is predicated upon majority rule. The majority elects our lawmakers, the government is formed from that elected body, and the government remains in office as long as it maintains the confidence of the House. That principle of democracy is one of the cornerstones of our society.

At the same time our free and democratic society also recognizes that a government which is accountable to the majority for its continuation must at the same time be governed by safeguards to protect minorities in society. That is a very important Canadian Jewish Congress and, in fact, Canadian concern. It is here that the great balance lies, that is, the balance between majority rule and the protection of minorities.

Parliament and the provincial legislatures responded to this in 1982 by enacting the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to strike a balance. In doing so Parliament and the legislatures each retained their legislative jurisdiction pursuant to sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act. However, at the same time the Charter acted as a withdrawal power from both levels of government in certain areas, those being political rights and fundamental freedoms, legal rights and equality rights. In those areas the courts—and not the legislatures or Parliament—are the arbiters. Even in striking that balance there were two great limits placed on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and on the jurisdiction of the courts. Those limits were section 1, which, as honourable senators know, provides that infringements on Charter rights are nevertheless valid, provided they are reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, and, as well, even if a limit would not be reasonable or demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, nevertheless, Parliament or a legislature could avoid the Charter by enacting a declaration pursuant to section 33 of the Charter. So, the Charter was, itself, subject to internal limitations.

I might footnote at this stage that it is the Canadian Jewish Congress' position that section 33 should at some point be repealed. We would suggest that an amendment to the Meech Lake Accord might be a very good place to do that.

In any event, the Charter is itself a compromise between majority and minority rule, with two great limitations put on it. It is our submission that, against that background, section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord contains two very basic flaws.

The first flaw is that section 2 does not speak in terms of equality. It speaks in terms of inequality. It speaks in terms of linguistic majorities. Rather than in terms of bilingualism, it speaks in terms of majorities and minorities.

The second fatal flaw, in our submission, is that it states that it is the role of the Quebec government to preserve and promote—and I underline the words “and promote”—Quebec's distinctiveness. In our submission, there is a clear direction to the courts that it is the responsibility of the Legislature of Quebec, and not that of the courts, to preserve distinctiveness, and that can be preserved by unequal legislation. The most obvious candidate, I suppose, for validation, pursuant to section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord, would be the French-only signs in Quebec on the basis that that promotes distinctiveness.

In connection with section 2, I would note that no mention is made of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I have heard it said that, therefore, section 2 does not override the Charter of Rights. After all, it says nothing at all about the Charter of Rights. The difficulty with that argument is that the drafters of the Charter have made it quite plain that when they want to recognize the Charter of Rights, and when they want to recognize the relationship of the Charter of Rights to the Meech Lake Accord, they know how to do it. In section 3 of the Meech Lake Accord dealing with immigration the Charter clearly states that the Charter of Rights applies in respect of any agreement. In section 16, again, there is clear recognition of the role of the Charter of Rights with respect to multiculturalism and aboriginal rights. The fact that the drafters thought it necessary to deal with the Charter in those provisions is significant with respect to the absence of the Charter in section 2. For those reasons we would make the following three recommendations. The first recommendation is that section 2 be amended to indicate that, as with section 3 of the Meech Lake Accord, which provides a new section 95B of the Constitution Act, 1867, the role of the courts in interpreting and applying the Charter has not been altered or affected. An amendment to section 2 to make that point should be made.

Our second recommendation is that section 16 of the Meech Lake Accord be repealed altogether and in substitution for section 16 there should be an amendment to section 2(1)(a) to add a non-exhaustive list of “fundamental characteristics,” and I use that phrase in quotations, because that phrase is already in section 2 with respect to linguistic duality. There should be an additional list declared to be non-exhaustive of fundamental characteristics promulgated, which includes multiculturalism, aboriginal rights, equality of all Canadians, and specifically equality between men and women, and fundamental freedoms. Those also, in our submission, are fundamental characteristics and should be included in section 2 if what we are doing is listing fundamental characteristics of Canadian society, and that is what section 2 purports to do. It purports to list one of them. If that is what we are going to do, we should be listing additional ones.

Senator Frith: Otherwise list none.

Mr. Finkelstein: It is our submission that either section 2 be amended in the way that we suggest or it should be repealed.

Our third submission with respect to duality distinctiveness is that section 2(2) should be amended to provide that all governments have the obligation to preserve and promote this longer list of fundamental characteristics. Those are our submissions with respect to duality and distinctiveness.

With respect to the Supreme Court of Canada, in section 6 of the accord the Supreme Court of Canada is the ultimate arbiter of social disputes settled through legal proceedings, and it is the ultimate arbiter of the relationship between Parliament and the legislatures, and the relationship between Parliament and the legislatures, on the one hand, and individuals, on the other.

Canadian Jewish Congress has no quarrel with the principle of involvement of provincial governments in the appointment process to the Supreme Court of Canada. However, Congress has grave concerns about the rigidity of the formula. That rigidity, in our submission, can lead to three problems: the first is an excessive risk of confrontation; the second is an excessive risk of accommodation having nothing to do with the appointments themselves; and the third is the possibility of deadlock, which certainly over an extended period of time could lead to the bringing of the court into disrepute.

Under the accord Parliament can choose for the six non-Quebec seats from a list prepared by each of the provinces. So there is a good deal of flexibility there. If the Government of Canada does not like a name submitted by one province, it can go to a name submitted by another. There is a great deal of flexibility there. With respect to the three Quebec appointments, there is not the same flexibility. The provision speaks of Quebec submitting names. That can be a name; it does not have to be a list.

In our submission, what should be done with respect to that, as well as with respect to the other appointments, is that all appointments should be permitted to be made from lists provided by all of the provinces. In other words, with respect to the Quebec appointments, it is true that an appointment would have to be made from the members of the Bar of Quebec, but that appointment could be made from a list provided by one of the other provinces if the federal government did not believe that one of the nominees proposed by the Government of Quebec was suitable.

If the concern which underlies section 6 is to have provincial input, it is our submission that this submission deals with that concern. It also prevents any one province from distorting the appointment process.

Our second recommendation is that a mechanism be put into place for breaking deadlocks. It is our submission that there will not be any deadlocks if our first recommendation is accepted, but in the unlikely event that there is a deadlock it is our submission that a formula be put into the Meech Lake Accord, and the Victoria Charter, or some variant on the Victoria Charter, in our submission, would be quite suitable.

Our third series of submissions deals with the immigration provisions in section 3, and there are essentially two provisions: there are the amendments to section 95 in the accord itself; then there is what has been called the "political accord" in the preamble-type agreement.

Canadian Jewish Congress recognizes that these two instruments largely confirm and extend the practices which have already been put into place; however, Congress has several concerns. The first is that with the possibility of 11 departments of immigration there may be delays in immigration and admission of refugees. Our recommendation in that regard is that there be language inserted that would create specific federal ability to expedite the entry of immigrants in accordance with federal criteria.

Our second recommendation deals with the political accord, it is true—not the constitutional but the political accord. There is a guarantee that Quebec "will"—and I use that word in quotes—receive a share equal to its proportional total, and that may, in practical terms, affect the overall total. We recommend, therefore, that the Government of Canada have explicit powers with respect to setting national levels should there be a conflict, and that is a specific power not simply to set a national level but to ensure that in practice the national level can be fulfilled.

There is also in the political accord withdrawal from the federal government of the authority to provide reception and immigration services in Quebec. In our submission, that can lead to a generation of provincial rather than Canadian identity and, as well, to uneven services among provinces in these regards. So, our recommendation is that the federal government retain its past role in providing reception and immigration services.

● (1630)

Mr. Chairman, those are our submissions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Finkelstein. Does Professor Bayefsky wish to add anything now, or shall we simply go on to questions?

Professor Ann Bayefsky, Member, Constitutional Subcommittee on Meech Lake, Canadian Jewish Congress: I think I will wait for the questions, thank you.

The Chairman: Then we shall go directly to questions. Thank you very much for your presentation.

First on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Lucier.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for your submission. You raised some issues that we have not discussed in this committee so far, especially concerning immigration, and I think they are extremely interesting and worthwhile. However, I want to come back to an issue that you touched on, but did not develop, namely, the question of equality rights.

Professor Bayefsky, you have authored some of the leading documents on the question of the Charter and equality rights, and therefore you are familiar with the debate about the extent to which this accord, if it were to be enacted, would jeopardize women's equality under the Charter. Would you comment on that debate and give us your view, or the Congress' view, if it has one, on the jeopardy in which equality rights might be placed if the Meech Lake Accord were to go through unamended?

Professor Bayefsky: Senator Marsden, I think the answer turns on the focus of section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord. Section 2 emphasizes the role of Parliament, of the legislatures—the roles of government, in other words. In the Constitution Act, 1982—before the Hays-Joyal committee—the people of Canada were faced with the issue of strengthening section 1 of the Constitution Act. They were very strong—and Congress represented this same view—that section 1 should be strengthened to avoid the reference to a parliamentary system of government and to ensure the end of parliamentary sovereignty. However, the political compromise that was reached, without going through the same process of a joint committee, public consultations, and so on, was to add section 33. So the emphasis shifted again from individual rights to the abilities of government to override or control those rights where they saw fit. Of course, section 33 does not prescribe any reasonable limits for overriding rights.

The Meech Lake Accord does a similar kind of thing. The emphasis is again put on government, and the ability of government does not seem to be restricted by individual rights. The role of Parliament and the role of the legislature is affirmed. To ensure that there is no derogation of powers as between Parliament and legislature there is a provision in subsection 4 of section 2 which says that nothing derogates from the powers, rights and privileges of the Parliament or the legislature. The obvious inference is that there might be a derogation of power, but it is not from Parliament and it is not from the legislatures. The only persons left are the people of Canada. The emphasis is on government as opposed to individuals. Section 2(4) suggests that the individual rights are in jeopardy. I might add that in the special joint committee report the suggestion is made, “Well, look, section 2 is simply affirming sociological facts.” Professor Hogg's recent book suggests that, in fact, this will have minimal direct legal effect. But the problem is that constitutional law is more subtle than a question of, “Does it grant a power or does it not grant a power?” That is not the issue. The issue is whether the interpretation clause provided by section 2 can work in such a way as to assist the courts in defining what constitutes a power or not. That is important. So it is more subtle.

It is true that one might admit that sections 2(2) and 2(3) do not provide powers, but their ability to influence what constitutes a power via the interpretation of what is a “distinct society,” and so on, is a threat to the definition of powers both in sections 91 and 92.

[Senator Marsden.]

I come back to Professor Hogg's recent book, because it was the object of a recent editorial in the Globe and Mail, which supported it. He says:

There are some provisions in the Constitution of Canada that do, in effect, constitute exceptions to the Charter of Rights. For instance, a law relating to Indians could not be attacked as discrimination on the basis of race.

Setting aside the problem that section 91(24) is exempted by section 16 of the Meech Lake Accord, that is exactly the problem with Lavell, isn't it? It was not obvious what was discrimination on the basis of race. In fact, women's groups argued that it was discrimination on the basis of sex. But the court found that defining what was discrimination on the basis of race, and therefore expressly permitted in the words of the special joint committee's report under 91(24), was allowed under 91(24) and therefore was not affected by the Canadian Bill of Rights. That is what Congress, and women in particular, are worried about in the definition of what constitutes a power.

Section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord could similarly suggest that what is in reference to a “distinct society” or a fundamental characteristic of Canada being duality could go to the definition of what constitutes discrimination on the basis of race, sex, and so on.

Finally, in answer to your question I would point out that the European Court of Human Rights has interpreted the European Convention on Human Rights by use of a concept called a margin of appreciation. It emphasizes a deference again to government—the view that government finds the legislation is okay; the state has acted reasonably, in good faith. The Meech Lake Accord pushes courts to come to the same kinds of conclusions—to defer to government views as to what is necessary to promote a “distinct society.” The preservation of all rights, including the rights of men and women—and women in particular—will require courts to be strong, firm and objective in their requirement of forcing governments to account for the reasonableness of their actions. The Meech Lake Accord pushes the court in quite an opposite direction.

Senator Marsden: I have what is almost a “yes” or “no” type of question to pose. The argument is widely made—including in a recent article by the Leader of the Government in the Senate in the Montreal Gazette—that the women of Quebec think that there is no jeopardy for women in the Meech Lake Accord. If I understand correctly, the Congress has a national membership with many Quebec members, many of whom are women. In fact, I think one of your members was the past president of the Fédération des femmes du Québec, Sheila Finestone. Are there dissenting voices among the women of Quebec who are also members of your Congress, or are you united in the position which you have stated is the position of the Congress?

Professor Bayefsky: The Constitutional Committee, which was delegated the authority to articulate the views of Congress, is unanimous in their view that the threat is real.

Senator Marsden: Thank you.

The Chairman: Next is Senator Lucier, followed by Senator Argue.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Finkelstein, during your presentation—and I think you will have an opportunity to read this later—you mentioned on several occasions changes that should be made to the Supreme Court, how provinces should present lists for appointments to the Supreme Court, and how the people from the provinces should be permitted to enter the Supreme Court. You never once mentioned the Territories. Are you aware of the fact that Canadians living in the two northern Territories have been relegated to second-class status by this Meech Lake Accord, and that Canadians from the two northern Territories cannot be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada? Was this exclusion in your presentation an error on your part, or do you really believe that should be so?

Mr. Finkelstein: The Congress has not taken a position with respect to the Territories in this regard.

Senator Lucier: Since you are appearing before this body making a presentation, and you are discussing how appointments to the Supreme Court should be made, do you not think that you owe it to us and to the people of Canada to make your presentation on all of the facts and to take a position on whether or not the Territories should be entitled to have appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada in exactly the same way as any other Canadians?

Mr. Finkelstein: Our recommendation is that the Meech Lake Accord, with respect to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, be amended in this way: that instead of each province being able to prepare a list of names from its own membership, that is, the membership in its own provincial bar, it be entitled to do so from the membership of any provincial bar, and that that should apply to Quebec as well. That is the recommendation that the Canadian Jewish Congress is making.

Senator Lucier: You are then in agreement with what the Meech Lake Accord proposes, that is, treating Northerners differently from all other Canadians?

Mr. Finkelstein: Our recommendation does not exclude people from the Territories. I might add that insofar as I am aware a number of lawyers from the Territories—perhaps most of them—are also members of a provincial bar. They would not be excluded from the process should they be nominated by a provincial government.

Senator Lucier: I would suggest to you that it is a remote possibility that their names would ever be put forward. I would point out that many of them are not members of the provincial bars of the province that they originally came from. Most of them have allowed their membership in those bars to lapse. Many of them never became a member of a bar before they went to the Yukon.

I am just pointing out that your presentation seems to follow the Meech Lake Accord, which treats the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories as second-class citizens. If this has been done inadvertently I would accept it, but if it was done purposely I would suggest that you rethink your position.

Senator Argue: I think the Canadian Jewish Congress has made an excellent presentation, and I acknowledge with gratitude the tremendous contribution that the Congress and Jewish people in Canada have made to Canada over all these years.

I wonder if either witness would care to remark on the general reduction of federal powers within the whole Meech Lake Accord. Do you feel that that general reduction of powers is part of the problem that you have and that it may create other problems for the country in terms of economic initiatives, and so on?

Mr. Finkelstein: The thrust of Congress' recommendations, as it understands them, lies in the relationship between governments and the people and not in the relative relationship between Parliament and the legislatures. It is for that reason that Congress has limited its submissions to only the "duality distinctiveness" provision, appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the immigration provision, and that it has not made any recommendations at this time with respect to appointments to the Senate and the federal spending power.

Senator Argue: As I understand your three main recommendations, they all have a particular application to Quebec, or Quebec has a particular application to your representation. If the unanimity clause is maintained, what chance do you think you have of getting Quebec on side in terms of these major amendments that you have suggested? I would suggest to you that the chance of getting the amendments through under the present agreement is about zero. I would appreciate your comment on that.

Mr. Finkelstein: That may be, senator. It is Congress' position that the Meech Lake Accord in its present form is not acceptable, and that it would be better not to have an accord than to have this particular accord.

Senator Argue: I think you have already answered my last question, but I will still put it. If the period of three years should go by and this accord is not ratified, that would be welcomed by the Canadian Jewish Congress, is that correct? Perhaps I should rephrase that. If the three-year period when this is to be ratified should go by without all the provinces ratifying it, and the accord should fall to the ground because of the failure of all of the provinces to ratify it, then I take it that unless you are able to get these amendments through you would welcome the fact that after a three-year period, as I have stated the question, the Meech Lake Accord would not be in effect?

Mr. Finkelstein: That is correct. Having no accord is better than having this accord.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Argue. The next questioner will be Senator Stewart, and that will complete my list of questioners.

● (1650)

Senator Stewart: My first question relates to the "distinct society" interpretation rule. We know that there is a provision that this rule is not to derogate from the powers of the two levels of legislatures. I do not know what that means. I am asking these distinguished constitutional lawyers to help me. Let me put my question this way: Do you think that the new interpretation rule may mean that in the future sections 91 and 92 will be interpreted in a way or ways different from the way or ways in which they would have been interpreted if that new interpretation rule had not been introduced?

I would like you to answer that question generally, but I would like you then to comment specifically upon the interpretation of the relationship of the "peace, order and good government" clause, on the one hand, and the "property and civil rights in the province" clause, on the other hand, as those two provisions might appear to clash in a situation of alleged emergency, as in the case of the anti-inflation bill.

Professor Bayefsky: It is possible that the definitions of what constitutes powers under section 91 and section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 will be different after the Meech Lake Accord. I think the reason for that is that constitutional law is subtle and depends upon an interpretation or definition by the courts of the purpose of the legislation, among other things. Section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord states that certain purposes are acceptable, significant and important, that they are so important as to be part of the fundamental characteristic of Canada, and therefore legislation which is aimed at the promotion or preservation of those purposes is more likely to be found by the courts to be intra vires. Therefore, it seems to me that, if the "peace, order and good government" power is one in which the federal government is left over with powers that are not defined by property and civil rights, an increase in the definition of what constitutes property and civil rights will mean a diminution of what is to be interpreted to be peace, order and good government. That is precisely what I think section 2 permits.

Senator Stewart: Thank you.

Let me go on to my second question, which concerns your comments about appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. Let me express an uneasiness which I feel, and which you seem not to feel. It appears to me that the proposed new arrangement will make judicial appointments to this court, if not a matter of patronage, a matter of quasi-patronage. After all, the provincial governments will now have a constitutionally recognized role in the selection of judges. A province—Ontario, for example—might say, "Quebec is going to be able to nominate at least three judges. We have lawyers who would, we think, make great judges and we want our people in there. Here are the names." Similarly, Nova Scotia, my home province, at some point might say, "Well, we have been passed over three times now. Surely we have a right to have our candidate selected. We have a distinguished law school; we have a distinguished bar; surely this is our turn." Is there not going to be a whole politics of judicial appointment, or at least a highly complicated politics of appointment such as we have not had in the past?

Leave aside Senator Lucier's question altogether for the moment and just focus on the provinces. They are going to be insisting on getting their own people in there, especially now that the work of the court is becoming increasingly important. Is that not correct? If so, why do you not object?

Mr. Finkelstein: Senator, the possibilities for patronage are there no matter which level of government makes the appointment, but the ability to bestow patronage—and I suppose this is at the root of the Congress submission—varies with the ability to fulfil that patronage. The more rigid the formula, the more easily a province could make a patronage nomination. Similarly, the more flexible the formula, the less able it would be to do so. Therefore, if a judicial appointment came up and only one province could submit a name, the possibilities for patronage would be very high. On the other hand, if a judicial appointment came up and any one of ten provinces could submit a name, any one province, knowing that nine others could make nominations, would be far less likely to make a patronage nomination.

Senator Stewart: But you just pass over—you neglect entirely—the point I make, that provinces will be saying, "We now have a right to nominate, which implies that we have a right to expect that from time to time our nominations will be accepted. You have passed us over three or four times. We cannot argue that we have a constitutional right to have our candidate appointed, but surely natural justice requires that this appointment come to Nova Scotia," or Newfoundland, or what-have-you. This, it seems to me, enhances the possibility of what I have called quasi-patronage.

Professor Bayefsky: Again, I think the submission is that, while it is true that a given provincial government will object to being passed over time and again and will eventually be due its appointment, the ability of all provinces to be able to submit names will, as my colleague has mentioned, encourage the superior quality of the individuals that are put forward and eventually appointed from that province. We will have a larger pool of individuals from which to select.

Senator Stewart: You are saying that your proposal would be somewhat better than the Meech Lake proposal, but you are not arguing that it is ideal.

Professor Bayefsky: We are not arguing that the provision be entirely apolitical. We are saying that we recognize the propriety of leaving certain kinds of appointments in a political arena, but we think it should be toned down, or at least improved upon by a competition, shall we say, for the best individual to rise to the top.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Stewart.

Before I thank our two witnesses, I would like to ask a question, if I may, which is a follow-up to Senator Argue's question. It has been said repeatedly that if there were any changes, any amendments, made to the Meech Lake Accord it would fall apart. Do I understand correctly from your response to Senator Argue that in the view of the Congress the accord is sufficiently flawed that you would support amendments to it even though it might mean that the accord would not proceed?

● (1700)

Mr. Finkelstein: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Professor Bayefsky: The only thing I would add is that the answer is emphatically yes, because of our fundamental concern first and foremost with the rights of Canadians as individuals and minorities, and the flaws and threats to their liberties, as set out in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are sufficient to warrant the result of which you speak should no amendment be forthcoming.

The Chairman: Thank you. It now remains for me to thank the witnesses for their appearance. We thank the Congress and your president, who was here earlier, for the work put into preparing this brief. We very much appreciate it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Our next witness will be Mr. E.L.R. Williamson, a consulting economist from Ottawa.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. E.L.R. Williamson was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Mr. Williamson, we welcome you to our committee.

Honourable senators, Mr. Williamson's brief has been distributed to the offices of all senators—by Senator Bell, I believe.

Mr. Williamson, I notice that it is a fairly lengthy brief. We have 45 minutes. Unfortunately, I cannot extend the time beyond that, because our rules state that at 6 o'clock the chairman must leave the Chair. So I presume that you will summarize your brief and leave us some time for questions.

Mr. E.L.R. Williamson, Consulting Economist and Master in Political Science and Economics: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Please proceed.

Mr. Williamson: Mr. Chairman, I should like, through you, to express my thanks to this honourable house for the opportunity to appear and discuss this very important matter. I should also like to express my thanks to Senator Bell for her kindness in making the suggestion that I should study the Meech Lake Accord and prepare some comments, out of which my brief has grown.

With respect to that, I might say that the more I have studied the Meech Lake Accord the greater has been my concern as to the importance of this document and the gravity of the consequences that may arise if it is implemented.

I would first note that the proposals have been made by the Prime Minister and the premiers without any mandate from either the Parliament of Canada or from any provincial legislature. Indeed, it may be argued that the Prime Minister has acted contrary to the original ideas he expressed before the last general election—and the role of general elections is extremely important in respect of the Meech Lake Accord.

The changes are so profound, so sweeping, that if implemented they will alter the whole structure of government in Canada. It will profoundly alter the relationship of the parts of the central government, one to another; of the provinces to the central government; and of the citizens to the governments. It will certainly make much more clear the transfer of sovereignty in Canada from Parliament to the Supreme Court. That process was started by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There can be no question, I think, of the effect of the Meech Lake Accord to make that sovereignty absolute in the hands of the Supreme Court.

In my brief I have included quotations, particularly from the late Mr. Norman Rogers, as to the effect of judicial interpretation taking the place of legislation. I commend those quotations to your thoughtful consideration.

Even more—perhaps I should not say “even more,” but certainly of equal import—is the consequence of the Meech Lake provisions in respect of the power of Parliament to control the economy.

I need not say anything before this august house, the members of which are thoroughly familiar with what has taken place over the past few months, not to say the last few years, about the uncertainty and difficulty in the economy. That uncertainty and difficulty will not be diminished in the future, but will in all probability be extended and exacerbated.

I commend to you the quotation from the Rowell-Sirois Commission of 1940 in which it expressed unequivocally the feeling that the economy of the country was difficult enough to manage in any circumstances and certainly impossible to manage in circumstances in which the central government could not formulate a national economic policy.

We have said that there is no vestige of a mandate for these changes. I take the position in my brief that there is ample evidence in past practice in Canada and Great Britain—with references also to somewhat parallel situations in the United States and France—that the approval of the electorate is a vital necessity.

● (1710)

Therefore, there is the question of securing a mandate from the electorate. Of course, this assumes that the public will be aware of the tremendous import of what they will be asked to decide. The definition of democracy is that it is “a system of government in which the vast majority of the people take a continuous and active interest in the affairs of government, are able to improve their condition by means of free and equal discussion, and are able to give effect to their will through the means of their elected representatives.” The various parts of that definition are extremely important. Since we abolished, to all intents and purposes, the teaching of history in Canadian secondary schools, it is doubtful whether there is a sufficient body of informed opinion in the public, and this is a matter for grave concern. As an aside, does this situation mean that there is clear evidence that the provinces have not done their job under their responsibilities for education? Is it conceivable that what we ought to be looking at is a system whereby a national educational standard is laid down? Of course, this is an entirely separate issue, but I am pointing out that it has a profound bearing on whether the electorate of Canada is in a position to make such a decision, because they do not understand the heritage of this nation. They have been cut off from that long process of development which is referred to by Lord Brougham, one of my early quotations, as the means by which constitutions can grow. If the people of Canada are not in a position to give that essential attention to the affairs of the government, continuously and actively, are they able to decide their own long-term best interests? We can only hope so.

I think we also need to consider whether the people are willing to take the time and the trouble. John Stuart Mill, more than a century ago, said, "A people may prefer a free government, but if through indolence, cowardice, or lack of interest they are incapable of exercising those exertions, they are not likely long to enjoy it." There is no guarantee of our continued existence. We have certainly not been given a blanket assurance that, no matter what we do, we shall go from better to better. We can suffer the fate which other nations have suffered, nations with very long histories and great attainments, which, in the end, were unequal to the exertions necessary, and therefore they failed. The late Arnold Toynbee said there have been twenty civilizations in the whole of human history, that we are the twenty-first, and that, indeed, we may be the last. So let us face the fact that we are up against a position in which, it might well be said, Canada has its back to the wall.

I have referred to the fact that occasionally some people in prominent circumstances, shall we say, have referred to the fact that the Senate of Canada is not elected. It was not intended to be elected. The Fathers of Confederation, in my view very wisely, saw that the Senate should be independent of partisan politics, not scrambling to outbid each other in order to be elected but a body that could, profoundly and carefully, out of its accumulated wisdom, reach conclusions which a more febrile House of Commons might not reach or, at least, reach too late. I have suggested in the brief that any body that is ensuring that the people of Canada have a full opportunity to consider and to assume responsibility for what is going to happen to them is, in fact, representative of the people, whether they have been elected or not, and I would commend to honourable senators the thought that in these circumstances you may well be much more truly representative of the people and the electorate of Canada than the ladies and gentlemen in the other place.

Senator Argue: I'll buy that one!

Mr. Williamson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to weary honourable senators by going over parts of the brief they have or can have before them. I am quite prepared at this juncture, with your permission, to submit myself to any questions they might like to raise.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Williamson. The first questioner is Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: I am from Nova Scotia. One of the constant complaints of Nova Scotians is that they were—to use the the word they used in those days—"Shanghaied" into Confederation. There was no election in Nova Scotia on the issue, and I believe it is fair to say that there was no confederation election in one of the other two provinces which became the four original provinces in 1867. So, it is really not accurate to say that the Canadian tradition is that these constitutional innovations should be founded on a recent expression of the will of the people.

Mr. Williamson: Senator Stewart, I should like to observe that the situation in 1867 was somewhat different from what it is today. Most markedly, I would point out to you that none of the four colonies, including the colony of Quebec or Lower Canada or Canada East, had ever possessed sovereignty. In the circumstances we are now talking about it is something which is quite different. Canada as a whole has complete sovereignty. The provinces have sovereignty within certain defined areas, a sovereignty which they did not possess before 1867.

In 1867 a simple Act of the Imperial Parliament, which possessed all the sovereignty, was all that was necessary to effect Confederation, the Imperial Parliament having made their decision on the basis of opinions expressed to them by many political leaders, and also in terms of the interests of the British Empire as a whole.

I would point out to you that only a very short time before that the Imperial government had found it necessary to send the Brigade of Guards from Great Britain to Canada to protect it from the distinct possibility of an American invasion. There were important questions of the protection of these colonies and their future existence, and the colonies themselves might have been unable to understand all the issues at that time.

We now have a position where the question of sovereignty is directly and responsibly placed on the Parliament of Canada and on the provinces. Therefore, with respect, sir, I suggest that the situation is quite different.

Senator Stewart: My second question is a quite different kind of question. I believe the witness is an economist, so he will be peculiarly qualified to deal with this question.

Reference was made to the argument in the Rowell-Sirois report that it was very difficult to establish a national economic policy in a federal country such as Canada. Of course, in the years since 1939 or 1940 we have struggled with the problem of developing economic policies in this federal state.

However, is it not true that in a sense we are now making a new departure? Trade arrangements have been worked out with the United States under which, in the future, we will not be relying nearly so much on Canadian national economic policy as we will be relying on the operation of a North American market, and it will be on that non-political body, the North American market, that our economic progress will depend. For example, the trade arrangement will put severe restrictions on the capacity of the national government—or, indeed, a provincial government—to shape such an important matter as energy policy. It will also place severe restrictions on the capacity of governments—federal and provincial alike—with regard to regional economic development. So, really, is it relevant in this new environment to talk about the Rowell-Sirois report? We are moving into a situation in which government is going to be less and less important, a situation in which market forces are going to be what we will rely upon for our economic prosperity.

I just wonder if you have taken into account the new economic environment which will flow from what I call the Washington Accord.

Mr. Williamson: Senator Stewart, your question is very well taken. You place me in the position of saying that if I were to give an adequate reply to that question I would take all of the rest of the time which this honourable house has seen fit to allot to me. I am afraid that I will have to say to you, by way of a very brief, inadequate answer, that I regard the so-called Free Trade Agreement—or Washington agreement as you have termed it—as being of a similar dimension and similarly having potentially very great dangers for Canada. Indeed, if we were to pass the Meech Lake Accord and the Free Trade Agreement, I am afraid, if I were a betting man—which I am not—that I would be prepared to bet absolutely any sum of money that Canada would not survive for even a generation.

Senator Stewart: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Stewart. Next is Senator Lucier.

Senator Lucier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Williamson, first of all I want to thank you for the time you have spent on your brief. I have gone through it and I find it very interesting. I take it from your opening remarks that, like many others in Canada, you had not spent much time on the Meech Lake Accord before Senator Bell asked you to take a look at it.

As a Northerner, I am very offended by Meech Lake. However, as a Canadian, I feel that the long term effects of Meech Lake could be very damaging to us and have some very negative impacts on our future.

My concern is, sir, how do we bring these fears to the people of the provinces, who are the ones who must go after their premiers and tell them to take another look at this document? It seems to me that every time I go to British Columbia and speak to anyone about Meech Lake, as soon as I start talking about it they understand what I am saying. The normal response is: "How did this matter ever get this far?"

My question to you is: Is there any way you could suggest that we could make the rest of Canada aware of what is in this document and what the long term ramifications of it might be?

Mr. Williamson: Senator Lucier, I think I would have to say that my own conception of what should be done is on the last page of my brief—namely, that this house, if it takes the step of rejecting the Meech Lake Accord, will certainly stir up the proverbial hornet's nest. However, in stirring up that hornet's nest I am convinced that you will also stir up the concerns and the attention of the people of Canada. If you did reject it, quite clearly the government would have no alternative to asking for the dissolution of Parliament and a general election, in which the Meech Lake Accord would be the point at issue. If that were done, I think a sufficient number of people in this country who share your concerns would speak as your friends in British Columbia have spoken to you. I think it is possible to make the people of Canada realize what is at stake, but it will have to be a clear rejection that forces this general election. It will not do to say: "Let us try to tinker with the Meech Lake Accord." If we try to patch it up a little bit here or there, all that is going to happen is that the people who know what they are talking about will be dissatisfied, and the people in the country as a whole will still not understand.

There needs to be a clear-cut, dramatic issue placed before the nation as a whole, and then I think they will respond. I may be wrong; I have said before that nations can, and do, commit political, social, economic and cultural suicide, and there is no way to prevent a nation from doing that if it is bound to. However, I do not think that the people of Canada are prepared to commit suicide; I think that they would respond.

I hope that I have made that rather tenuous suggestion a reasonable answer to you, sir.

Senator Lucier: In your brief you discuss the power of Parliament to control the economy. I wonder if the Meech Lake Accord does not, in effect, remove the control of the economy from Parliament and put it in the hands of the First Ministers. I wonder if they are not in fact creating a fourth level of government where the First Ministers' conferences are now being enshrined, and, as with Meech Lake, ten premiers and a prime minister go into a room and decide the future of Canada, including the future of the economy in Canada, and come out with a document such as this that they take to their legislatures for approval. Have you looked at that, and would that concern you, sir?

Mr. Williamson: Absolutely, sir. I certainly envisage that this business of enshrining the First Ministers' conferences constitutionally is a very grave step that the nation as a whole does not appreciate in any way. But that is exactly what that is going to do. We will, in effect, have a committee of 11 that will make, without any debate other than amongst themselves, definitive solutions which they will be able to impose upon the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislative assemblies. In other words, it will dramatically and seriously reduce any chance of effective democratic government in this country.

Senator Molson: I would like to ask the witness this question: If the Senate chose to follow his advice about dealing with the Meech Lake Accord, what does he think the effect would be on the province of Quebec? At the moment I am not talking about the merits of the Meech Lake Accord; I am just thinking purely of the effect, and I am wondering if the medicine in that case would not be much worse than the disease. I am afraid that you would be putting Quebec back quite a few years, where the whole thought of separation from Canada would have some logic and a great deal of appeal.

Mr. Williamson: Senator Molson, your question is exceedingly good. Quite obviously, taking it from the broadest aspect, if we have to destroy Canada in order to keep Quebec within Canada, then the whole thing is pretty much a gesture of futility.

From the standpoint of Quebec, let us simply face the fact. I think that the mass of the people in Quebec—and I am not speaking now of political leaders who have particular points of view that are often simply designed to secure their own power—will realize that Quebec has only one of two alternatives: either being in Canada as a regular, participating, effective part of Canada or, there being no other alternative outside of possibly a short interregnum, being forced into the hands of America. If they are forced into the hands of America, Quebec must face the fact that there will be no nonsense about bilingualism or biculturalism or a special status or a privileged community. As an American wardheeler in New York would say, “You will be American or else.” That is what Quebec has to face. They either have to take the position that the great leaders of Quebec—Sir George-Étienne Cartier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, among others—took in the past, which was that Quebec is a loyal part of Canada, or they will face extinction.

It may require a shock to convince them. What I have just said might very well be the kind of shock that would really make Quebec understand that they are at a crossroads and that they must choose one way or the other and accept the consequences.

Senator Argue: Mr. Williamson, you pictured a scenario in which the Senate would reject the Meech Lake Accord, I take it, and this would stir up a hornet’s nest. This would lead to a federal election, and the people of Canada would then, I gather, take care of the Meech Lake Accord.

As I understand the authority of the Senate, it does not really extend to the point where we can block the accord. We can have an opinion, we can have a statement, we can have a position, and it may influence some people in the country or many people in the country, but I do not think it necessarily means death to the Meech Lake Accord.

The position of the Premier of New Brunswick is not totally clear at the present time, but from everything I read he might tend to oppose the Meech Lake Accord. In Manitoba we have an evolving situation, as I would read it, where the forces opposed to the Meech Lake Accord are gaining ground, and I do not think they are confined to one political party. I think there is a possibility that Manitoba will reject the Meech Lake Accord or just fail to ratify it. There is the situation in Ontario where inquiries are still going on, and I gather that public opinion is quite evenly divided, or certainly divided. It is not at all clear that Ontario will ratify the Meech Lake Accord.

My question is this: Do you think that the Meech Lake Accord is doomed even without a federal election—and there will be a federal election, but without the federal election being held on that issue—by the likelihood of one or more provinces failing to ratify the accord within the prescribed period of time?

Mr. Williamson: Senator Argue, I would point out that the question of the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord comes under the provisions for amendment to the Constitution, which are in the Constitutional Act of 1982. Therefore, it would be entirely possible for both Ontario and Manitoba either to reject or simply to take no action, and the rest of the provinces with Quebec, which has already taken action, could still put this through. In other words, the unanimity requirement, which will obtain after the Meech Lake Accord is in operation, if it comes into operation, would not apply in the present circumstances. Therefore, leaving it to someone else would be a very dangerous expedient.

Senator Argue: I do not argue with you, and I am not qualified to argue with you on what you have stated as your constitutional grounds for the statement you have made. However, from everything that I have read it was agreed by the premiers—and this is part of the accord—that there has to be unanimity before the accord goes through. I do not dispute that they may revert back to the formula under the Constitution as it is without the Meech Lake Accord, but do you not agree that it has been stated that there must be unanimity, and, if there is no unanimity, the failure of one province to say okay means that the Meech Lake Accord is non-existent?

• (1740)

Mr. Williamson: Senator Argue, if I may respectfully refer you to the section of my brief which refers to the politicians’ obiter dicta, there have been many statements made by the Prime Minister, the provincial premiers and a great many other people as to what Meech Lake means, what Meech Lake will do, and what may or may not be required. If it comes to a showdown, then the Prime Minister and those who are anxious to put Meech Lake through can fall back on the strict legal position and say, “Oh, yes, we would have liked to have unanimous consent, but since unanimous consent has not been given, well then, we will go ahead on the strictly legal provisions of the Constitution Act of 1982. It is in force; it is done.”

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Argue.

Mr. Williamson, your last comments make me wonder, because I am under the impression that unless there is unanimity there is no possibility of Meech Lake going through, but your point is that it can go through under the old formula.

Senator Frith: Politically it would be difficult, but legally it is quite possible.

Mr. Williamson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. May I add that Sir Winston Churchill once wrote that “Admiral Jellicoe was the only man who could lose World War I in an afternoon.” I suggest that this honourable house is the only power in Canada that can save Canada or allow it to be destroyed in an afternoon.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Williamson, for appearing before the Committee of the Whole today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before I call for the Committee of the Whole to rise, may I say that I have received a letter from Mr. Louis “Smokey” Bruyère of the Native Council of Canada, asking that two corrections be made to Hansard of December 2 last. At page 2267 "Premier McKenna" should read "Premier Buchanan".

The footnote to one of the appendices, as given to Hansard, is also incorrect. The corrected version will be sent to all honourable senators. Those corrections will also appear in the bound volume to be produced at the end of the session.

Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, February 3, 1988.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

7	33,110	35,120	$22,290 to $30,347

* Based year 1978 — amounts vary with degree of urbanization

The Senate Committee poverty lines are based on a formula which is updated annually on the basis of a measure of disposable personal income in Canada and changes in the distribution of families of various sizes.

THE SENATE POVERTY LEVEL is approximately 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product. For families of sizes 2, 3 and 4, the Poverty Lines are almost exactly half of the average income for families of those sizes.

STATISTICS CANADA: Poverty Level Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE POVERTY LINES &
STATISTICS CANADA REVISED LOW-INCOME LINES
FOR 1986

1986 Family Size	Percent and Number Below Senate Committee Poverty Lines 1986	Percent and Number Below Statistics Canada Low-Income Cut-Offs for 1986*
Unattached Individuals	35.4%  (1,012,000 persons)	34.3% (982,000 persons)
Family Units of two or more persons	20.9%  (1,444,000 families)	12.3% (852,000 families)
Total Number and Percentage of Persons Below Poverty Line	22.4%  (5,713,000 persons)	14.9% (3,689,000 persons)
* 1978 base for revision
 Senate poverty lines include more families

1985
Unattached Individuals	35.9% (985,000 persons)	36.6% (1,003,000 persons)
Family Units of two or more persons	21.1% (1,444,000 families)	13.1% (901,000 families)
Total Number and Percentage of Persons Below Poverty Line	22.8% (5,783,000 persons)	15.9% (3,900,000 persons)

Statistics Canada figures for 1986 show that the lowest 20% of families and unattached individuals (lowest income quintile) received only 4.7% of total income. In contrast, the highest 20% of families and unattached individuals received 43.0% of total income. These figures indicate that the gap or disparity between the lowest and highest income groups has stayed relatively constant in recent years. That is, the income of the highest group is about ten times that of the lowest group.

CANADIAN STATISTICAL REVIEW, JUNE 1984 — The Senate Committee Poverty Lines (Senate). The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator David A. Croll, developed poverty lines based on income levels which reflected "items of basic need". These lines are differentiated by family size and adjusted each year by an escalator based on living standards as reflected by the amount of disposable personal income available in Canada in any given year. The annual escalator is designed to adjust for real as well as nominal changes in income and for change in average family size over time. The resulting poverty levels are close to half of the average income for families of sizes 2, 3 and 4 in 1981. Senator Croll releases periodically an update of the Senate Committee poverty lines and those released for 1981 were used in this note.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 28, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

FRANCINE LEMIRE

TRIBUTE TO GOLD MEDAL WINNER AT WORLD WINTER GAMES FOR DISABLED

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I rise to give recognition to the tremendous achievements of Francine Lemire, a disabled cross-country skier from Corner Brook, Newfoundland. Francine Lemire, a 35-year old who has one leg amputated above the knee and skis on a prosthesis, won two gold medals for Canada at the World Winter Games for the Disabled in Innsbruck, Austria, beating out skiers from West Germany and Switzerland. She won the five-kilometre cross-country ski race in 17 minutes, 34.4 seconds last Tuesday and two days later won the ten-kilometre race in 36 minutes and 33.1 seconds.

Francine also won the ten-kilometre gold medal in 1986 at the World Winter Championships in Salen, Sweden. She returns to Newfoundland this weekend to resume her work as a doctor at the West Coast Clinic in Corner Brook.

With the Winter Olympic Games coming up next month in Calgary, we should note the example that this distinguished disabled skier from Newfoundland has set for our Canadian winter athletes.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 2, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXING OF PENSIONS—STATUS OF LEGISLATION IN COMMONS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, might I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning the business of this house? Bill C-33 is before the House of Commons and concerns, amongst other things, the de-indexing of pensions of public servants. There is a great deal of support within the Public Service for pension indexing as it now exists, and in consequence there is a great deal of opposition to this bill from the Public Service Alliance and many others.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us at what stage that bill is now in the House of Commons, or if it has been withdrawn or if it will come to the Senate at a later date?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I suppose I should not comment on the dispatch or otherwise with which legislation is dealt with in the other place. I believe that at this time the bill has not yet reached the second reading stage, so I would expect that it would be some considerable time before it makes its way to this place.

Senator Argue: That is probably an honest answer!

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1987

THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-104, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CURRENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, for the second reading of the Bill C-99, An Act to amend the Currency Act.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, Bill-99, an act to amend the Currency Act, is a non-controversial bill. It is designed, as Senator Marshall very eloquently indicated yesterday, to bring consistency to the procedures followed in the Public Accounts of Canada. The bill changes certain methods of reporting and accounting in line with recommendations made by the Auditor General, Kenneth Dye. Those recommendations referred to the consolidation of the Exchange Fund with the Consolidated Revenue Fund for purposes of determining the fiscal position of the government.

The Exchange Fund is a special account of the Minister of Finance, which serves as the principal repository of Canada's official international reserves. Although the Exchange Fund has been consolidated with the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the public accounts, it exists as a distinct accounting entity and is governed by separate legislation, namely, the Currency Act, which Bill C-99 proposes to amend.

In calculating the net income of the Exchange Fund, the Currency Act draws a distinction between regular investment income and valuation gains or losses. The latter, which are due to exchange rate changes and gold sales, are averaged over three years in the Currency Act while they are recognized immediately in the Public Accounts Consolidation. This amendment will eliminate this difference in accounting treatment which was created by the consolidation introduced in 1986.

Honourable senators, I said at the beginning of my remarks that this is a non-controversial bill. It was given speedy passage in the other place, and we, on this side of the house, are prepared to do the same thing.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Marshall, the proposer of this bill, might I ask if it is the wish of the Senate that this bill be referred to committee?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I spoke to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Senator Doody: As did I.

Senator Frith: The Deputy Leader of the Government says he did also. I think the committee should take a look at it, however brief a look that might be, but we should receive a report from the committee before we give this bill third reading.

Senator Doody: We have no problem with that. As you say, I also discussed the matter with Senator Leblanc, the chairman of the committee. He is prepared to deal with it as soon as we get it to him. I assume that Senator Marshall, as proposer of the bill, will move that it be referred to the committee at the appropriate time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marshall, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

• (1410)

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CUSTOMS ORDERS VALIDATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bazin, for the second reading of the Bill C-96, An Act to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables.—(Honourable Senator Barrow).

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, Bill C-96, an act to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables, was presented yesterday. I was not here at the time, but I know that Senator Barootes made a capable and full presentation.

It is a short bill concerning primarily what one might call housekeeping matters, although I understand with respect to the matter of validating certain election procedures the amount in question ran to several millions of dollars.

In view of this, perhaps the bill should be sent to a committee, at least for an explanation concerning the delay in rectifying this matter, which covers a period of some 13 years. If the mover were to agree to have this bill referred to the appropriate committee, which I believe is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, we, on this side, would be prepared to agree that it should receive second reading.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Barootes speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to have Bill C-96 referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS)—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-12, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Qualifications of Senators).—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, once again I want to say that I am not trying to hold up this motion in any way. If anyone wishes to speak on this order, I will gladly yield.

Order stands.

THE SENATE

REFERRAL OF SUBJECT MATTER OF GOVERNMENT BILLS TO COMMITTEES—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Finlay MacDonald rose, pursuant to notice of Monday, July 6, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the practice of referring the subject-matter of government bills to the appropriate Senate Committees.

He said: Honourable senators, I notice that this inquiry, standing in my name, has been on the order paper since July 6. I have concluded that there may be other ways of speaking to this matter, which may give me an opportunity for some mischief sometime in the next month or so. Therefore, unless some other senator would like to take a crack at this, I suggest that this inquiry be withdrawn from the order paper.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 2, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 2, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1987-88

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-108, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1988.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its Sixteenth Report respecting its examination of the expenditures proposed by supplementary estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1988. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 2598).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SENATE TASK FORCE ON MEECH LAKE CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD AND YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, 8th December, 1987, the Senate Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and the Northwest Territories be empowered to present its final report to the Committee of the Whole no later than Monday, 22nd February, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a unanimous request from the task force itself, since we were unable to hold certain meetings because the Senate was not sitting and, as well, because certain senators were unavoidably absent. In view of the fact that those senators have participated fully in the whole discussion, it was felt that no final decisions should be taken without the presence of those senators. Therefore, we have asked for the extension of two weeks.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION PAPERWORK REDUCTION ADVISORY COMMITTEE

SMALL BUSINESSES AND TOURISM

Question No. 30 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall.

2nd September, 1987—1. With reference to the May 8, 1987, announcement made by the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) concerning the implementation of a Paperwork Reduction Action Plan, (i) what is the breakdown by Province of members of the private sector advisory committee of key national small business associations who provide advice to government on how to reduce paper burden; (ii) how often does the Committee meet; and (iii) what is the amount of the per diem allowance, including transportation to and from meetings?

2. Under the overall program removing obstacles to entrepreneurship, what are the names and job description of those responsible to administer the program?

3. How many inquiries have been received to date under the program since its inception from (a) Statistics Canada; (b) Supply and Services; (c) Revenue Canada; and (d) Employment and Immigration?

Reply by the Minister of State—Small Businesses and Tourism:

1. (i) The Paperwork Reduction Advisory Committee is comprised of the President and the following ten members, representing national or provincial associations:

Doreen Braverman

Keith Alexander, President

Ian Eastcott

Gale Botting

Willy Cooper

Margaret Lewis

Eric Owen

Marc Mineau

Pierre Fournier

Laura Bennet

Clariss Budkowski

(ii) It is expected that the Committee will meet approximately four times per year.

The first meeting was held on July 3, 1987, the second on September 10, 1987 and a third meeting is scheduled for December 10, 1987.

(iii) Members are reimbursed for accommodation, meals and transportation according to Treasury Board guidelines.

2. Paperwork Reduction Action Plan, which resulted from the Removing Obstacles to Entrepreneurship report, has not created any new positions to handle the work. Responsibilities of some senior officials have been redefined to include work emanating from the Action Plan.

3. During the period May 8 to October 30, 1987, the following estimated number of inquiries have been received:

(a) Statistics Canada - 69

(b) Supply and Service - Nil

(c) Revenue Canada - 24

(d) Employment and Immigration - 1

TAX REFORM 1987

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), for the adoption of the Twentieth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Tax Reform in Canada), tabled in the Senate on 1st December, 1987.—
(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this order follows from the debate on the motion for the adoption of the twentieth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on tax reform. I had that order adjourned in my name to give anyone who might wish to speak to it an opportunity to do so. It has been on the order paper now for some weeks. I have spoken to the chairman of the committee who feels that we have given ample opportunity for anyone who might wish to speak to it to do so. Therefore, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, I suggest that Senator Sinclair's motion be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION STANDS

On Motion No. 1:

By the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C.:

THAT,

WHEREAS the Constitution Act, 1982 came into force on April 17, 1982, following an agreement between Canada and all the provinces except Quebec;

AND WHEREAS the Government of Quebec has established a set of five proposals for constitutional change and has stated that amendments to give effect to those proposals would enable Quebec to resume a full role in the constitutional councils of Canada;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto sets out the basis on which Quebec's five constitutional proposals may be met;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

AND WHEREAS section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987
Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B.(1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C.(1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

"General"

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:

"Courts Established by the Parliament of Canada"

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 101 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Supreme Court of Canada"

101A.(1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B.(1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

(3) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) of any of the three judges necessary to meet the requirement set out in subsection 101B(2), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the Government of Quebec.

(4) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) otherwise than as required under subsection (3), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the government of a province other than Quebec.

101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E.(1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—CONFERENCES ON THE ECONOMY AND OTHER MATTERS

148. A conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year to discuss the state of the Canadian economy and such other matters as may be appropriate.

XIII—REFERENCES

149. A reference to this Act shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

Constitution Act, 1982

9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers legislative powers from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province was entitled; to be represented on April 17, 1982;

(e) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(f) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(g) the Supreme Court of Canada;

(h) the extension of existing provinces into the territories;

(i) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces; and

(j) an amendment to this Part."

10. Section 44 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"44. Subject to section 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons."

11. Subsection 46(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"46.(1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province."

12. Subsection 47(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"47.(1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution."

13. Part VI of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"PART VI
CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

50.(1) A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year, commencing in 1988.

(2) The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

(a) Senate reform, including the role and functions of the Senate, its powers, the method of selecting Senators and representation in the Senate;

(b) roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries; and

(c) such other matters as are agreed upon."

14. Subsection 52(2) of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (c) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(d) any other amendment to the Constitution of Canada."

15. Section 61 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"61. A reference to the Constitution Act 1982, or a reference to the Constitution Acts 1867 to 1982, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

General

16. Nothing in section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867 affects section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we all know, this motion standing in Senator Murray's name deals with the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and the proposed amendments to the Constitution.

I expect that the subject matter of the motion is presently before the Committee of the Whole which is studying the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. But is it Senator Murray's intention to actually formally move that motion, since, as I understand, it is the same motion as has been passed by the House of Commons?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): My understanding is that Senator Murray does, indeed, intend moving that motion. I believe that he spoke briefly to Senator MacEachen about it a few days ago and indicated to him that he will send him a letter to outline a procedure that he thinks might be in order. As the deadline approaches for the clock running out, he feels that we should deal with it. I am sure he will be open to any discussion that Senator MacEachen may want to have with him.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Motion stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to bring forward the following order for Wednesday, February 3, 1988:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the steering committee met last Thursday and, on looking over the list of submissions that we had received—and I would remind you that there were advertisements put in the newspapers in December inviting submissions—it was recognized that we had received a substantial number. Prior to that we had already had a list of witnesses whom we had asked to appear.

In view of the timing, the steering committee felt it would be impossible to hear all of the witnesses unless we establish a different procedure. It was felt that the solution to the problem was to set up a submissions group of this committee to proceed with that matter. Therefore, a motion to that effect has been distributed to all of you.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, that we read the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps someone other than the chairman should move the motion.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Frith: I am honoured to do so. I move, seconded by Senator MacEachen:

That a group of eight Senators of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, to be known as the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, be appointed to assist the Committee of the Whole to hear such representations thereon as are referred to it by the Committee of the Whole;

That the Submissions Group be composed of three Senators nominated by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and five Senators nominated by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate;

That the quorum of the Submissions Group be three members;

That the Submissions Group be authorized to send for persons, papers and records and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by it;

That the Submissions Group be authorized to engage the services of such clerical, technical and other personnel as it deems necessary;

That the rules and procedures applicable in committees apply to the Submissions Group;

That changes in the membership of the Submissions Group shall be made pursuant to Rule 66(4) of the Rules of the Senate; and

That the Submissions Group be instructed to present its findings to the Committee of the Whole no later than March 30, 1988.

I would be glad to speak to this motion after you have put it, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Argue: On a point of order, I believe Senator Frith said that the motion was seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen. I wonder whether it is possible for a senator to second a motion when he is not in his seat.

The Chairman: The point of order is well taken. Would Senator Frith name another seconder?

Senator Frith: Senator Argue.

The Chairman: The motion is seconded by Senator Argue.

Senator Argue: I just did a "Frith" on you—everything has to be just so.

Senator Frith: Senator Argue is clearly in his seat and is eminently qualified.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have very little to add. This matter was discussed in the steering committee of the Committee of the Whole. I was a member of the group at that time. We discussed the advantages of setting up such an assistance committee, as it were, so that the load might be taken off the chamber in Committee of the Whole and some of the work might be looked after by another group. We on this side of the house have no objection to this motion.

Senator Frith: Just to draw attention to a few of the provisions of the motion, honourable senators will notice that there is no request for the power to travel. The purpose of this group is to assist the Committee of the Whole through the hearing of the evidence of persons who have asked to make submissions on the Meech Lake Accord. This is a smaller and parallel group to the Committee of the Whole. The intention is that the hearings will all take place here in Ottawa.

Another minor point is the application of the rules and procedures applicable in committees. Honourable senators will remember that rule 66(4) provides a means by which the whips can change membership without reference back to anyone except the clerk and the committee concerned. Then there is the deadline on the reporting date.

I can add to what Senator Doody has said by saying that we on this side of the chamber also have no objection to this motion.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion? Senator Marsden?

Senator Marsden: If I may, I have two questions for clarification. The motion reads, "That the Submissions Group be instructed to present its findings . . .". That does not imply that those will necessarily be the findings of the Committee of the Whole, does it? In other words, would the findings of the Submissions Group be related solely to the evidence heard by that group?

Senator Frith: I would imagine, honourable senators, that the Submissions Group would report on its work and give a summary of the submissions that were made to it. It is my understanding that this group will report to the Committee of the Whole. In its form it is like a subcommittee, but there is no provision for a subcommittee of the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Marsden: If I may, I will ask one other question. I am sure this has been reviewed before, but, just to help us now, what is the precise timetable for the work of the Committee of the Whole? What is the absolute deadline beyond which this committee cannot go?

• (1420)

Senator Frith: Section 47 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution may be made without a resolution of the Senate if 180 days have passed after a resolution is passed in the House of Commons. In this case the 180 days will elapse on April 23, 1988.

That does not mean that the activities of the Senate on the constitutional proposal must take place within that period of time, because there is no provision to that effect; but, if the Senate does not act, the House of Commons can re-pass a motion, and further activity by the Senate is not necessary for resolutions authorizing a proclamation to take effect.

Senator Marsden: I thank the honourable senator. This past weekend Toronto newspapers reported that the Senate had to make a report by February 8. That was simply wrong?

Senator Doody: That is wrong.

Senator Frith: I am sure that what they were talking about was the report of the task force that went up north. I believe that its deadline for reporting was February 8.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, while we are on questions relating to the activities and timing of the Committee of the Whole, can you give us any information concerning the plans of the Committee of the Whole regarding the inquiry on the Canada-France fisheries question?

The Chairman: I am sorry, senator, but I am not in a position to answer your question in that regard. Perhaps other honourable senators can help you.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, this is not the same Committee of the Whole. The Senate resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole with regard to the Canada-France fisheries question, and it resolved itself into a distinct and separate Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Argue: We are being informal.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So there is no way that a report could be made by this committee relative to the work of another and quite distinct Committee of the Whole.

Senator Doody: I am not suggesting that we dissolve this Committee of the Whole and that the Senate resolve itself into another Committee of the Whole to answer a simple question as to whether or not we intend to have more inquiries on the Canada-France fisheries question. Perhaps Senator Stewart could indicate an easier way to obtain the answer to a simple question.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, the question could be asked in the Senate, which is the parent body of the Committee of the Whole, on the Canada-France fisheries question.

Senator Doody: I am to gather, then, that questions relating to activities of the Committee of the Whole are better asked in the chamber itself rather than in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): No, Mr. Chairman. Senator Doody makes the mistake of referring to "the" Committee of the Whole. The fact of the matter is that there is a distinct Committee of the Whole on each bill, or on each separate matter referred to a committee of the whole house. They are several, separate committees.

Senator Doody: I certainly take the advice of Senator Stewart, and I thank him for adding to my store of knowledge. Perhaps we could refer to Committee of the Whole "A" and Committee of the Whole "B", and perhaps run through all sorts of little gyrations as we go through, so that when we look at the order paper we will know to which committee we refer. There does not appear to me to be any great distinction on the order paper.

The Chairman: I regret that this Committee of the Whole cannot answer the honourable senator's question about the other Committee of the Whole.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I may ask you the question at the next sitting of the chamber. Perhaps you will be better advised or in better condition at that time—or perhaps "position" is a better word.

Senator Frith: Neither committee is "holier" than the other.

Senator Doody: But one appears to have a termination date.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we have before us the motion by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Argue, regarding the submissions group. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

Senator Doody: Are you sure you have the right committee?

Senator Frith: Yes, the committee on Meech Lake; your committee, Mr. Chairman.

[Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, asks me to present a report, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Molgat: Honourables senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, February 3, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE (SUBMISSIONS GROUP) ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat presented the following report:

February 2, 1988

Your Committee has the honour to present the following Report.

Your Committee recommends

THAT a group of eight Senators of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, to be known as the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, be appointed to assist the Committee of the Whole to hear such representations thereon as are referred to it by the Committee of the Whole;

That the Submissions Group be composed of three Senators nominated by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and five Senators nominated by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate;

That the quorum of the Submissions Group be three members;

That the Submissions Group be authorized to send for persons, papers and records and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by it;

That the Submissions Group be authorized to engage the services of such clerical, technical and other personnel as it deems necessary;

That the rules and procedures applicable in committees apply to the Submissions Group;

That changes in the membership of the Submissions Group shall be made pursuant to Rule 66(4) of the Rules of the Senate; and

That the Submissions Group be instructed to present its findings to the Committee of the Whole no later than March 30, 1988.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT

Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON
SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D)

TUESDAY, February 2, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1988, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, January 26, 1988 submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From Agriculture Canada:

Mr. Frank Claydon, Assistant Deputy Minister, Policy Branch;

Mr. Terry Pender, Administrator, Special Canadian Grains Program.

These Supplementary Estimates (D) 1987-88 request spending authority for $ 803.9 million for the Department of Agriculture for an extension of its Special Canadian Grains Program begun last year. Of the total amount, $ 800 million is to be paid to producers; the remaining $ 3.9 million is to be used for administrative purposes.

This program was created to help cushion grain and oilseed producers from low returns for their 1986 crops. International subsidy practices, fueled by the trade war between the European Community and the United States, had depressed prices to their lowest level in 50 years in real dollar terms.

Because this prolonged period of low prices continued into 1987, the program was extended to provide assistance on the 1987 crop. Assistance under the 1987 extension will be distributed in two installments the first installment of $ 800 million will go to producers by March 31. That is the installment covered by these estimates. The second $ 300-million installment will be paid by June 30 and will come from the 1988-89 estimates.

As was the case last year, payments will be made on acreage seeded to wheat, barley, oats, rye, mixed grains, corn, soybeans, canola, flax and sunflower seeds. Farm-fed grain is again eligible. Special crops have been added to the 1987 program. These include mustard, lentils, dry peas, canaryseed, safflower, buckwheat, fababeans, triticale, popcorn and dry beans. Benefits will be paid for alfalfa grown for processing. Finally, honey has also been included.

Individual payments will be made on the basis of price declines for eligible crops, regional yields, and seeded acreage. In Western Canada, provisions have been made to pay on summerfallow acreage since summerfallow is a common management practice among western grain producers, especially in drier regions. Also higher payments will be made this year to irrigation producers in recognition of their higher rates of yield.

The calculation of the assistance rate has also been changed for this year's program. Last year the rate on each crop was calculated as a combination of:

- loan rates determined by the U.S. farm bill
- estimated price decline between 1986-87 and 1985-86

This year, the assistance rate is calculated exclusively from the estimated price decline on eligible crops between 1987-88 and 1985-86. Officials indicate that by doing this, it is possible to subsidize farmers for such crops as mustard seed which are not directly affected by the U.S. farm bill. The Committee was pleased with this because it appears to be in response to the comment by the National Finance Committee in its report on Supplementary Estimates (A) 1987-88:

...the formula used to determine payments to producers takes into consideration only the estimated effects on individual commodity prices brought on by changes in the U.S. Farm Bill. No consideration is given to the specific actions of the European Economic Community. For example, if excess supplies in Europe of specialty crops such as mustard seed, safflower or lentils lead to dumping in the international market and result in falling incomes to Canadian farmers, no action under this program will be taken unless the United States takes prior remedial actions. This led Senators to believe the intent of the program risked being thwarted by the specific mechanisms intended to provide relief to Canadian farmers. (Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance p. 3:7)

In responding to the impact of the program in 1987 on the different regions of Canada, officials indicated that 85 percent of the benefit went to western producers. This year, this percentage is expected to rise to 87 percent as summerfallow will now be eligible. Table I in the annex of this report illustrates that Saskatchewan is the largest receiving province in the west and Ontario in the East. The actual number of farmers expecting to receive the benefits is shown in Table II. The actual assistance rates for individual crops are shown in Table III.

Under the original terms of the program and under this extension, individuals are eligible for a maximum payment of $ 25,000. Individual partners of a farm operation run as a certifiable partnership will be eligible under the program. But no individual will receive more than a maximum of $ 25,000 nor can they receive benefits for the same acreage.

In addition, each individual on a family farm working the land on a full-time basis is eligible for payment up to $ 25,000. This also applies to cooperative enterprises farms. Officials indicated that last year, of the 2,300 farms with seeded acreage making them eligible for more than $ 25,000, owners of 1,550 of these received payments in excess of the maximum because of these multiple ownership of cooperation provision.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 3, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE FRED A. McGRAND

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, it is public information today that, effective January 22, 1988, the Honourable Fred McGrand has submitted his resignation from the Senate.

It is with considerable regret that one must acknowledge the retirement of the Honourable Fred McGrand, M.D. It is especially sad to me, as a fellow New Brunswicker who has known and respected him for some 40 years, to witness the close of a very active career in public service that has spanned more than 60 years.

Senator McGrand was appointed to the Senate on July 28, 1955, by the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent. He was one of a considerable number of distinguished Canadians appointed at that time. With his retirement only two of that group now remain—our colleagues, Senator David Croll and Senator Hartland Molson.

Senator McGrand's formal career in public service began some 28 years before his appointment to the Senate, when he was elected in 1927 to the Municipal Council of Queen's County in New Brunswick. He continued to serve there until 1937, for two of those years as warden of the municipality. In 1935 he was elected to the provincial legislature and re-elected at general elections in 1939, 1944 and 1948. He served as Speaker of the New Brunswick Legislature from 1939 to 1944. In 1944 Fred McGrand was appointed Minister of Health and Social Services in the McNair government, and continued in that capacity until the electoral defeat of that administration in the fall of 1952 by a former colleague here on the Hill, the Honourable Hugh John Flemming.

Senator McGrand has served in the Senate with honour and integrity for more than 32 years.

That is a statistical summary of Senator McGrand's career in public service. However, a mere reference to the statistics is quite insufficient. Let me speak of the person behind those impressive statistics. Fred McGrand was born and raised in rural New Brunswick in humble circumstances, which helped to shape and give direction to his activities, both professionally and politically. He was first and foremost a medical doctor, and he chose to establish his practice in rural New Brunswick in the small railway community of Fredericton Junction. Dr. McGrand was an advocate and practitioner of preventive medicine, both professionally and as Minister of Health and Social Services.

He treated the whole person, medically, surgically when required—and his operating theatre was often the kitchen table—and psychologically as a social worker, family adviser and father confessor. He was indeed the complete physician. He made his patient's family an integral part of the treatment and recovery process. Something that is now recognized as being very necessary he recognized many, many years ago.

Without government assistance he personally financed and built a hospital in his community so that patients would know the comfort of remaining near the family home during treatment and convalescence.

In like sense, again both professionally and in government, he actively supported and promoted the Victorian Order of Nurses, an organization which also practises preventive care and treatment within the milieu of the home and in close cooperation with attending physicians.

It is no surprise, in light of his early life on the farm and humanitarian motivation, that Dr. McGrand has been an ardent and outstanding supporter, financially and otherwise, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Very few people are aware that years ago Senator McGrand established a trust, that has been totally financed and administered by himself, in memory of a deceased daughter. A good number of young New Brunswickers who needed assistance in furthering their education, particularly in the nursing profession, have enjoyed the benefits of bursaries and scholarships from that trust. To this day, some 30 years following his active practice of medicine in New Brunswick, thousands of the people there speak his name with deep, personal respect, and that is the ultimate accolade.

In the Senate, Fred McGrand was a most active and persuasive member, along with such respected senators as David Croll and our former colleagues, Muriel Fergusson and the late Elsie Inman, of standing and special committees, whose landmark investigations and reports have led successive governments to develop enlightened policies, policies such as ARDA that has evolved into helpful programs for small agriculture and woodlot improvements and management, policies for improved pensions, health and social services for the aging, child welfare and family allowances, and so forth—in short, policies for people.

It was only the determination of Senator McGrand that caused the Senate, on May 5, 1980, to make a special reference to its Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventative measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society;

Honourable senators, the report of that committee, entitled "Child at Risk", has become an internationally-recognized text book for those working in the field of social development and preventive criminology. It is one of the many accomplishments that has brought satisfaction and a true sense of worth to Senator McGrand. Enlightened action based upon that report and its recommendations will come and will be a tribute to the life and dedication of our colleague, a true reformer.

As honourable senators are aware, Senator McGrand was a model of reliability in his attendance in this chamber and in his dedication to committee work until this past year, when he suffered injury to his spine in an unfortunate accident. I can tell honourable senators that the decision to tender his resignation has been one of the most difficult he has ever taken. He misses very deeply his work and associations here in the Senate.

Honourable senators, it is an honour to be able to pay tribute in this place to a person who has been of such great value to the people of my province and the nation. I extend my best wishes for happiness and contentment in his retirement to Senator McGrand and to Mrs. McGrand.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I thank our colleague, Senator McElman, for having placed on the record something of the distinguished public career of Senator McGrand. I want to thank him most particularly for having shared with us his personal appreciation—based on a friendship now 40 years old—of Dr. McGrand's considerable contributions to the professional and public life of New Brunswick and Canada. It is indeed a remarkable record: election to municipal office somewhat more than 60 years ago; election to the provincial Legislature of New Brunswick in 1935—more than 50 years ago; and appointment to this place more than 32 years ago.

Senator McElman mentioned the report entitled "Child At Risk" that was issued a few years back by a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, under Senator McGrand's chairmanship. That report was one of the first Senate committee reports that I read from cover to cover after coming to this place, and I read it with tremendous fascination and respect. It is obviously a tremendous contribution—one of the greatest contributions that this or any other parliamentary body has made—to our knowledge and appreciation of an exceedingly complex subject. It has occurred to me more than once in the last couple of days that we will be revisiting that report in the not too distant future in the discussions that are bound to take place as a result of the Supreme Court decision of last week.

I simply want to join with my honourable friend in speaking on behalf of the government and all our colleagues in the Conservative Party to express our gratitude for the 32 years of service that Senator McGrand has given to Canada and New Brunswick in this chamber, and to record our profound admiration and respect for him as he leaves us.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, may I be allowed, as one who had the real pleasure of being Senator McGrand's seatmate, to say a few words? I claim that honour, but there is a more important reason for saying a word about Senator McGrand.

I grew up in a household where there was a small number of pictures: one was of the Sacred Heart; one was of H.R. Emmerson, who had been Minister of Railways at times which were better for the CNR in my province; and one was a picture of Allison Dysart, who had been the Premier of New Brunswick from 1935 onwards, and in whose party and government Senator McGrand served as a rookie member of the legislature. Because I was so delighted to be his seatmate, I engaged him in conversation during the quieter moments in this place. I questioned him about the days of the Dysart government, which was very progressive for its day, that is, 1935. That government, in fact, was responsible for New Brunswick being among the first—if not the first—of the provinces of this country to give its residents old age pensions, even if the amount was very modest.

Senator McGrand was a Liberal then, and he stayed liberal in the real sense of the word. I suspect that he is still more liberal than some of us. He is, perhaps, old in years, but he is certainly young in ideas, in interests and in anything that is new that could "alimenter" discussion on issues that are so important.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, at this point I feel I must take this opportunity to say a few words in French, especially since Senator McGrand told me a story I find very reassuring. He told me that in 1935, in the Dysart government's caucus, they debated whether a letter written in French by a resident of New Brunswick should be answered in French. After some discussion, it was decided that when a letter to the government in Fredericton was written in French, it should be answered in the language of the sender.

If we consider the progress achieved in our province since that time, I believe it is thanks to the attitude of those pioneers described by Senator McGrand. It is thanks to them that in the course of its history, our province has managed to establish a greater measure of justice.

[English]

I am sorry to have lost my seatmate, but I am hopeful we will have occasion to meet him again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 2, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

On Tuesday, January 26, 1988, a Message from the House of Commons requesting a change in the name of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Scrutiny was referred to your Committee for consideration.

Your Committee considered the Order of Reference on Thursday, January 28, 1988, and recommends that Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out paragraph (d) and substituting the following:

"(d) the Joint Committee on Regulatory Scrutiny to which shall be appointed eight senators".

Your Committee further recommends that a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House of the above action.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Wednesday, February 3, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee has considered a recommendation of the Subcommittee on Budgets of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration requesting a re-examination of Rule 112 of the Rules of the Senate with respect to the date by which the statement of the Clerk's receipts and disbursements are tabled.

Your Committee examined the matter on Thursday, January 28, 1988, and recommends that Rule 112 of the Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the word "May" and substituting the word "October".

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CHILD CARE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO CONTINUE STUDY OF FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE ON CHILD CARE ENTITLED: "SHARING THE RESPONSIBILITY" AND FEDERAL RESPONSE

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, February 9, 1988, I will move:

That, notwithstanding its order of reference of 5th May, 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the examination of the Final Report of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Child Care, entitled: "Sharing the Responsibility";

That the Committee be further authorized to examine the Federal Response to the said Final Report in which is outlined the National Strategy on Child Care; and

That the Committee present its Report no later than June 30, 1988.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—APPOINTMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will no doubt have noticed that on January 11 last the Minister of National Defence released three press releases in which he noted the appointment of a total of 40 senior officers of the Canadian Armed Forces. In two of the press releases we are given the names of the people who were promoted, including their first names, but in one press release we are given only initials, which makes it impossible for me to discover whether among the 40 there were any women. Does the Leader of the Government know what the breakdown is? If not, could he obtain that information?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question, but I shall obtain a reply from my colleague.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is now the year 1988. Since 1984 I have repeatedly asked the government, including the Leader of the Government in the Senate, whether it is prepared to fulfil the promise made by Mr. Mulroney at the time of the last election to apologize to and partially compensate Canadians of Japanese descent for acts done by the Government of Canada during and following the Second World War. Can the minister give us any further enlightenment as to the progress of this long and difficult question?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask my colleague, Mr. Crombie, to bring us up to date on that matter.

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) ADOPTED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that Order No. 6, consideration of the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, be moved up so that we can deal with it before we come to the first order of the day. Order No. 6 concerns Supplementary Estimates (D), which provide for payments to be made to the grain farmers under the grains assistance program. Therefore, in anticipation of debate on the second reading of Bill C-108, which provides for the actual granting of that supply, I ask leave to deal with Order No. 6.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (D) 1987-88), presented in the Senate on 2nd February, 1988.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

[Senator Marsden.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1987-88

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-108, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us is Appropriation Bill No. 5, 1987-88, which provides supply for all of Supplementary Estimates (D) for 1987-88. These Estimates total $804 million. They were tabled in the Senate on January 26 and were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on January 26. These special Estimates were discussed with officials from the Department of Agriculture and Treasury Board on January 28, 1988, and were reported on February 3.

These Supplementary Estimates seek funding for the Special Canadian Grains Program previously announced by the government. When approved by Parliament, the funding will enable the Department of Agriculture to make payments in the 1987-88 fiscal year to Canadian grain producers for their 1987 crop. The total estimates for this program amount to $1.1 billion, and $300 million will be provided in 1988-89. Honourable senators will recall that a similar program was undertaken relative to the 1986 crop. Payments under that program were made in the 1986-87 and 1987-88 fiscal years.

Honourable senators, this bill is in the usual form, and I am assured that it contains only the authority for the grain payment described. If honourable senators wish any further information, I will do my best to provide it.

I have here the statement of supply to date for 1987-88 and the statement of estimates tabled to date for 1987-88. I ask that they be appended to today's proceedings.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words in connection with Bill C-108. I am not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which studied the bill, but I see that the report of the committee is here. Although I was advised of the meeting by the chairman of the committee—and I want to thank him for that—when the matter was before the committee I had to attend to other commitments which had been made, and so I could not attend the meeting. Therefore, I would like to adjourn the debate and deal with it tomorrow.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the government has no problem with that. Royal Assent has been arranged for tomorrow. If the bill passes the second and third stages, we will be most pleased. Although there is no immediate squeeze, there is always a problem with cheque timing, and so on, and dealing with the bill tomorrow will not cause any great inconvenience.

Senator John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us when the Main Estimates will be forthcoming. Part of the money to be spent for the 1987 crop year will be covered in the 1988-89 Main Estimates, so it would be helpful to know when those Main Estimates will be before Parliament.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I do not have that information with me, but I will certainly seek to obtain it for tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I know that there are witnesses waiting to appear before the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Accord. The order is to be called no later than 3 p.m., but Senator Molgat, the committee chairman, is not in the chamber. He may well be advising the witnesses about their appearance. Perhaps it would be appropriate for us to proceed with the rest of the Orders of the Day and to revert to Order No. 5 later.

Senator Molgat has just entered the chamber. We have reached Order No. 5. If the witnesses are ready, there is no reason why we cannot proceed. If they are not ready, we can deal with the other orders and revert to this order. I suggest that we ask Senator Molgat to recommend the course we should take.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the first witness is due to appear at 3 o'clock. He is indeed somewhere in the building, but we do not have him at hand at the moment. So perhaps the best thing would be to proceed through the order paper. We will try to reach him as quickly as we can, and as soon as he is available I shall so inform the Senate.

Order stands.

THE SENATE

MR. LARRY GENDRON—FELICITATIONS ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while we have some time in hand, and though it is not our custom to acknowledge in the Senate the retirement of all our employees, there is one employee of the Senate who, this week, is retiring after 30 years of service. His name is Mr. Larry Gendron. Most honourable senators will know him as a member of the Committees Branch, who has been a very helpful and loyal employee, certainly in all of my time here. Larry began his employment with the Senate on January 8, 1958, with the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Major Lamoureux, as a Senate messenger for a two-month term. Then from March 1958 to 1963 he worked as a confidential messenger to the Honourable Ross Macdonald, then Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and his assistant, Alastair Fraser, who as you know, eventually became the Clerk of the House of Commons. From 1963 to 1965 Mr. Gendron worked as a confidential messenger to the Honourable Alfred Brooks and his assistant, the Honourable James McGrath. From 1965 to 1972 he was a constable, and then, from 1972 to date, a records clerk in the Committees Branch.

As I say, Mr. Gendron will be retiring at the end of this week. He is retiring in good health, so we can confidently wish him a happy and prosperous retirement.

Senator Argue: He will be greatly missed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if the committee is ready to proceed, we will come to order.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Vincent J. MacLean was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: It is my pleasure this afternoon to welcome as our first witness Mr. Vince MacLean, Leader of the Opposition from the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. MacLean has submitted a copy of his presentation and it will be sent to all honourable senators.

Mr. MacLean, normally we proceed with a presentation from the witness and then leave time at the end of that presentation for questions by members of the Senate. We are working within the time frame of one hour, so if you are ready to proceed we will be happy to hear from you.

Mr. Vincent J. MacLean, Leader of the Opposition, Province of Nova Scotia: Mr. Chairman, I thank you very much. I will keep my submission as brief as possible in order to allow for questions. As well, I have submitted to the Clerk a background paper which provides clarification for a number of questions and answers to some of the statements that I will make today.

Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to appear before this committee today. Before the Meech Lake Accord Canada was constitutionally incomplete, because the Province of Quebec stood outside of that constitutional agreement. I support the accomplishment that occurred at Meech Lake, but I contend that the Meech Lake Accord is not a perfect document and that there is considerable room for improvement in the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

I reject the proposition put forward by some that the Meech Lake Accord is unalterable. The political will displayed by the First Ministers who drafted the accord must now be equalled by those who, with the legislative authority, will make recommendations to improve and, let us hope, change that accord.

This committee has heard many recommendations from concerned citizens across the country, many of whom wish to see the accord improved. I am one of those individuals. I suppose you must start your consideration of the accord with a reference to your vision of Canada.

Canada is a country that has many strengths. One of those strengths is not only the equality of her people but the equality of her regions. Coming as I do from Atlantic Canada, in my opinion it is very important for Atlantic Canadians to see a strong central government maintained. The ten provinces often represent widely diverging interests in this country, and I feel that a strong central government is necessary in order to see that there is equality across the country. I fear that the central government's ability to offer Canadians new and exciting social programs is jeopardized by the accord, and I refer specifically to subsection 7(1) of the accord. I believe that that subsection impairs the federal government's ability to initiate any new national shared-cost programs. By allowing the provinces to opt out of new national programs and receive reasonable compensation the stage is set for a national patchwork of social programs.

Medicare is an excellent example. Had this accord been in place in the 1960s I am quite sure that implementation of Medicare would not have been possible. However, a strong central government insisted on going forward with it and urged Quebec and Ontario to join in, which they inevitably did, making for one of the best medical care systems that exist in the world.

Another example is child care. With that particular situation we have ten provinces attempting to establish ten different child-care programs across Canada, each "compatible" with the national objective, but far different in scope and method from one another. The result can hardly be called a national program.

There are no judicial definitions of "reasonable compensation" or "compatibility", nor is there any clear understanding of what is meant by "national objectives." Some individuals indicate that we should wait for a judicial decision to interpret what those words actually mean. I would prefer to see those definitions in the accord rather than left to the interpretation of the courts. I would rather see the language of this clause clarified than discover that, according to the courts, last year the First Ministers signed away the potential for any new national shared-cost programs.

Another concern that I have deals with sections 2 and 16 of the accord. In tandem, they raise the question as to whether gender equality rights guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms could be overridden by the linguistic duality/distinct society clause. The issue of gender equality rights is too important to await a decision from the courts. I believe that the accord should include a clause that states that gender equality rights override linguistic duality/distinct society provisions.

The final point that I would like to bring to your attention relates to an area that has received the most attention in my province of Nova Scotia. It deals with one seemingly harmless clause, namely, paragraph 13(2)(b) relating to the fisheries. Here we discover that "roles and responsibilities in relation to the fisheries" have been placed on the agenda of all future First Ministers' annual constitutional conferences. That seems innocent enough, but consider that its very inclusion in the Meech Lake Accord suggests that constitutional changes are required in the "roles and responsibilities" in relation to the fisheries. I think we can all agree that improvements are possible, but shifting the traditional responsibility for such vital decisions—such as who gets licences and how quotas are shared—from Ottawa to the provinces would not be an improvement. Actually, I think it would cause chaos in the industry.

Industry spokesmen have indicated quite clearly that it would cause uncertainty and anxiety if it is left in the accord. This uncertainty cannot now be completely corrected. The fact is that the clause referring to fisheries has been included in the accord, and to remove it would be next to impossible. However, it is possible to amend that particular section to protect the traditional and historic rights of Nova Scotia fishermen as well as safeguard the industry from total chaos. I believe that is essential.

Nova Scotians have been sailing to and fishing off the waters of Newfoundland for the past 200 years. The right of Nova Scotians to fish in these waters has been established both through history and tradition. Some of that history and tradition was also utilized when we established our claim to a section of Georges Bank. This right is now jeopardized by Newfoundland's desire to gain greater constitutional authority over fishery matters.

I want to point out that I have no quarrel with Brian Peckford. He is doing what he thinks is best for the province of Newfoundland. However, those gains to Newfoundland would be made at the expense of Nova Scotians. Taking jobs and opportunities from Nova Scotians and moving them to another province is certainly not my idea of how Canada works. Should Newfoundland's legitimate aspirations for greater prosperity be furthered by removing economic activity from Nova Scotia? To that I answer categorically no.

The question that arises is, what is Newfoundland's constitutional objective? Brian Peckford has confirmed that the fisheries clause was included in the Meech Lake Accord at his insistence. For the past ten years Brian Peckford has been quite clear in his aspirations with reference to the fisheries. As a matter of fact, the Government of Newfoundland submitted a document to the federal cabinet Committee on Fisheries Restructuring in March of 1983. In that document the Government of Newfoundland stated:

Newfoundland takes the position that all stocks of fish in its adjacent waters must be available to the Newfoundland fleet until existing (Newfoundland) plants are fully utilized.

In other words, Brian Peckford is saying that in those waters which are defined as Newfoundland waters the fish should be caught by Newfoundland fishermen, in Newfoundland boats, and processed in Newfoundland plants, and, if there is any left over after that occurs, then other provinces can share in those fisheries.

Mr. Peckford was also very careful to mention that he does not want complete jurisdiction. He only wants shared jurisdiction or concurrent jurisdiction. He does not want control over international relations, the setting of the total allowable catch, policing, and fisheries research. He is prepared to leave those expensive items under the control of the federal government. Newfoundland's objective, therefore, is to shift the responsibility of licensing and the division of quotas to the provinces. This would allow the provinces to determine who fishes off their coast and where that catch is landed.

Can Brian Peckford achieve this particular objective under the accord as it now exists? The answer is yes, because seven out of ten provinces with 50 per cent of the population would have to agree to any change. Even if Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick were to disagree with the transfer of jurisdiction, it could still be passed, because the seven-out-of-ten rule would apply. The province with the most to lose in this particular situation is my province, and Nova Scotia would be powerless to stop the process.

What kind of economic impact would it have on Nova Scotia? First, the fishery would be balkanized. Imaginary lines would be drawn between the various Atlantic provinces. Who would control the Bay of Fundy or the Northumberland Strait or the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or where would the dividing line be between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia? At stake here is approximately 5,000 to 6,000 Nova Scotia jobs. The loss of that fishery would send economic shock waves throughout Nova Scotia. Proud towns like Liverpool, Lunenburg, Canso, Louisburg, Lockeport and Petit-de-Grat and Alder Point would lose their largest employer. Unable to fish off Newfoundland, where would these trawlers go? They would go to the Scotian Shelf, where there would be greater competition for the already limited resources and place additional burdens on the in-shore fleet in that area.

In short, this seemingly innocent clause in the Meech Lake Accord has the potential of reducing Nova Scotia's relatively prosperous fishing industry by almost half. To be specific, in 1986, out of so-called Nova Scotia waters, Nova Scotians landed 136 million pounds of fish; out of so-called Newfoundland waters, Nova Scotians landed 130 million pounds of fish, approximately 50/50. For those of you unfamiliar with fishing, a million pounds of groundfish will create 13 jobs. With a multiplier of 2.9, that means, on the low side, 5,000 jobs, and, on the high side, 6,000 jobs within the province of Nova Scotia.

The Fisheries Council of Canada told a special parliamentary committee that the fisheries clause in the Constitutional Accord has initiated a process that, if left unchecked, would:

- (1) Cause conflict between the provincial and federal governments;
- (2) Cause ongoing uncertainty in the fishing industry, thus crippling investment and initiatives; and
- (3) End with the balkanization of the fisheries leading to escalating government costs and fisheries management chaos.

Fishing in the province of Nova Scotia is more than just an economic pursuit, it is a way of life in our coastal communities, and one that should be protected.

The obvious question that now arises is: What is the remedy? As honourable senators well know, the Meech Lake Accord cannot become law until it is passed by the 11 Parliaments of this country. If there is to be a fundamental change in the responsibilities of government in relation to the fisheries, surely the provinces most affected by the fisheries must be in agreement. Other matters are on the agenda, such as Senate reform, and that would require the unanimous approval of all ten provinces, as listed under section 9 of the accord, section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

I am proposing that the roles and responsibilities in relation to the fisheries be included in a list of items that require unanimous consent. This simple amendment would, in effect, give the provinces with a direct interest a veto over the changes in responsibility. In other words, every province that has an interest in the fisheries would have the right to veto any changes in the roles and responsibilities or jurisdiction before those changes were made.

This amendment does not close the door to future changes in jurisdiction, but it does ensure that all parties affected agree with those changes. Senate reform requires unanimous consent. Based on symmetry alone, or parallel construction in legislative drafting, it is not unreasonable that fisheries changes should also require unanimous consent. As a member of the Official Opposition in the province of Nova Scotia, I will be putting forward such an amendment when the Constitutional Accord comes before the House of Assembly in the province of Nova Scotia, hopefully when the session opens on February 25.

Honourable senators, the Meech Lake Accord has been called a flawed document. I concur with that assessment, but I also consider the Constitution Act of 1982 flawed simply because Quebec was not then a willing participant in the constitutional process, but to correct one flaw with several more is not the way to proceed. I understand Quebec's constitutional aspirations. I believe that those aspirations could still be met in a Meech Lake accord that took into consideration the concerns that I have raised. I have asked for: (1) Wording to be clarified; (2) Rights to be made clear; (3) The fisheries clause to be amended.

There is absolutely no connection between Atlantic Canada's fish and Quebec's aspirations. Nova Scotia should not be asked to pay such a price for Quebec's signature. I want to see Quebec sign the Constitutional Accord, but I do not want to see 5,000 Nova Scotians lose their jobs as a consequence.

I thank honourable senators for their kind attention and I am prepared to attempt to answer questions honourable senators wish to address to me.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. MacLean. I have a number of names on my list already. We will start with Senator Hicks, to be followed by Senator Ottenheimer.

Senator Hicks: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. MacLean, for your cogent observations on the Meech Lake Accord and for the legitimate expression of the concerns of some Nova Scotians with particular respect to the likelihood of changes which would affect our fishing industry. I am sure we all agree with you on that, but I would like you to clarify your position just a little further.

The accord says that the question of fisheries will be on the agenda of succeeding First Ministers' conferences. It does not, as I understand it, say anything more than that. In other words, there is no predetermination that changes will result from the consideration at the First Ministers' conferences.

Is it not true that, while you could have a constitutional amendment which would affect fisheries now if, as you said, it were approved by seven provinces having 50 per cent of the population of Canada, when the Meech Lake Accord comes into effect that would require unanimous consent, and every province would, in effect, have a veto in relation thereto? Would you comment on that?

Mr. MacLean: Thank you, senator. I believe that the very fact that it has been included on every agenda until it is resolved indicates that constitutional changes are necessary. That has been indicated by Brian Peckford in his statements in Newfoundland to the effect that he has felt for the first time a real achievement has been made, because that will be dealt with in a constitutional manner.

Fisheries was on the agenda of only one of the last seven First Ministers' conferences. If it is now going to be on every agenda, regardless of who the premier of Newfoundland is, whether that individual be a Liberal or a Conservative, whether it be Brian Peckford or someone else, that individual will be forced, because this item is on the agenda, to make strong arguments on behalf of his fishermen. In making those arguments—and they will be made, to some extent, publicly—to demand changes for his province, you are forcing that individual to continually take that position by having it continuously on the agenda. Sooner or later the other provinces—western provinces which have no axe to grind on this particular issue—will say: "What do we have to do to get this item off the agenda?"

Under the accord, as I read it, respecting fisheries only seven out of ten provinces would be necessary to transfer that jurisdiction. It is quite likely, then, that some deal could be made to gain the support of the Premier of Newfoundland on a particular item in return for the transfer. Even if the other three maritime provinces objected, the whole process could go forward. That is why I have asked for a veto for the provinces concerned so that they must all be in agreement before such a transfer could occur.

Senator Hicks: I will not argue with the witness, Mr. Chairman, but I will leave that point with the suggestion that, if that were to occur, that would require a constitutional amendment—that is, to transfer jurisdiction in relation to fisheries from the federal government to the provinces, or to some province with respect to some part of the fishery. If that is going to be done on the basis of seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population agreeing, it has to be done before the Meech Lake Accord becomes effective, because, once the Meech Lake Accord becomes effective, all the provinces have to agree to a constitutional change.

Mr. MacLean: Senator, I hope that you are right in that particular aspect, but I have consulted a considerable number of people who are knowledgeable and they informed me that even after the accord is passed seven out of ten would be able to transfer the fisheries. That is why I am expressing that particular point of view.

● (1500)

Senator Hicks: If that is so, you are certainly correct, and I agree with you. I will have to look more carefully into the situation.

Do you think that under any circumstances the jurisdiction over fisheries should be transferred to a province or a group of provinces, or do you think it should stay with the federal government, as it is now?

Mr. MacLean: I believe that the jurisdiction should stay with the federal government in order to ensure that the resource is protected and that we eliminate conflicts between provinces. If you transfer jurisdictions to provinces, we will have continual arguments over whether or not the fleet should be on one side of the Bay of Fundy or the other, or on one side of the Northumberland Strait or the other, and it will make a conflict between fishermen in Atlantic Canada almost impossible to avoid.

I have drawn a map which indicates the possible respective boundaries that would come into effect—one that was used with reference to the offshore agreements—and I have submitted that in the package which you will be receiving a little later. If you can see the lines that would be drawn when fishermen traditionally fished in many other areas, then you would see the great possibility for that conflict. I believe that the jurisdiction should remain with Ottawa.

Senator Hicks: Thank you, Mr. MacLean.

[Mr. MacLean.]

The Chairman: Next is Senator Ottenheimer, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Ottenheimer: I am sure the witness is aware that the position put forward by Newfoundland, which was agreed upon, is an examination or discussion of roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries. There is not, nor has there ever been to my knowledge, a request or expectation that there will be a transfer of jurisdiction; that fisheries will cease being within federal jurisdiction and will become a matter of provincial jurisdiction. That is not the position which was taken by Premier Peckford or by his government but, rather, that that whole area should be re-examined to see if there may be shared jurisdiction with respect to certain aspects of the fishery. Nor has the suggestion been that this would only be for Newfoundland; it would be for all coastal provinces who so wished.

I would ask the witness if he thinks there might be some merit in this. First, I emphasize that it is not the position of Newfoundland that the fishery would come under provincial jurisdiction, not federal. That is not it. It is to examine and discuss together with all the provinces and the federal government the possibility of sharing jurisdiction, and also that this be accessible to all coastal provinces, because obviously we are speaking about ocean fisheries and the concept of a joint management. For example, the Atlantic Accord deals with an entirely different resource. It deals with hydrocarbon resources on the continental shelf off Newfoundland. After that was negotiated, a quite similar agreement was entered into between Nova Scotia and the federal government. I realize the resources are different, but I believe that these accords are something quite new and imaginative in terms of joint federal-provincial resource management. Maybe a mechanism like that might not be of interest to other coastal provinces—not only Newfoundland. Nova Scotia may not wish to exercise some shared jurisdiction in terms of fishery management in the waters as well.

To sum up, as a Newfoundlander, I never look forward to getting into arguments with Nova Scotians. We have many things in common, particularly a lifestyle which in many ways is the same. But the real threats to the fishery on the east coast of Canada today are basically foreign. There has been the Canada-France situation, the overfishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks by the Spaniards and Portuguese just outside the 200-mile limit, but still on the continental shelf; and then the overfishing by Common Market countries. In a more internal manner in Newfoundland—it may be less so in Nova Scotia, but it might be a problem there too—we have had some bad failures of the inshore fishery. It is difficult to identify why, but some people think it is because the offshore effort is too great—and that could be the Canadian effort as well as the foreign effort. There are all of these problems.

I think it is in our best interests as Atlantic provinces—and the others as well—with fishermen who are dependent on the fishery for the economy, to endeavour to work together.

I believe that the witness is extremely suspicious of Premier Peckford and his government, and of Newfoundland's motivation. I would point out that this is a shared jurisdiction, not a total transfer, and it is suggested that it be available to all the coastal provinces. That is not much of a question, but I wish to put it that way and end with this question: Does the witness think that there is some merit in that?

Senator Frith: You say "extremely suspicious." Are you suggesting "unjustifiably" so?

Senator Ottenheimer: In my opinion it is, but I did not wish to use such a term. However, I thank the honourable senator for using it for me.

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps the reason that I am a bit suspicious of Premier Peckford and his statements is that he has remained an extremely committed Newfoundland premier, with a vision of how he wants to see resources—which he considers to be within the rightful ownership of Newfoundland—controlled.

As a matter of fact, on July 8, 1978—and I can go year by year—Premier Peckford stated:

The proposition that the fish off this province of (Newfoundland) 'are the property of all Canadians' is not only legal nonsense but is morally untenable and not in accordance with the nature of our federation.

In 1979, in the discussion paper by the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador on the bilateral issues of the fishery, he stated:

Management of the Province's fisheries resource must proceed from the basic principle that the people of Newfoundland have an historic and moral right to the economic benefits which can be derived from those resources in its surrounding area. This right is no less compelling than Alberta's right to its resources on land. Newfoundland believes that it must have a predominant role, and, in certain cases, the paramount voice in the management of the fisheries resource in those areas of the Canadian 200-mile zone which are contiguous to the Province. We also believe that this can only be assured for the longer-term by a Constitutional amendment.

All of those statements, and many more dating back ten years, continually show that Brian Peckford wants to obtain a constitutional amendment which would give Newfoundland greater authority over what he terms as Newfoundland waters. If we permit that to occur, and the division of the quotas as well as licensing and where fish are to be landed are transferred to the provinces, that would be positive for Newfoundland. However, it would be extremely negative towards the province of Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Does that conclude your questioning, Senator Ottenheimer?

Senator Ottenheimer: If I may be permitted another one, then that will conclude my questioning.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Ottenheimer: I realize what the witness is saying there, but I think it is late to dwell on whether Premier Peckford used the term "a kind of historic right or custom" or not. If one were to maintain that there were historic rights for Newfoundlanders in certain waters adjacent to Newfoundland, obviously one would also agree that in certain waters adjacent to Nova Scotia, the Gaspé or British Columbia there were areas where historically, not only over decades but in some cases centuries, residents of a specific area had fished and this was the foundation of their socio-economic life. In a sense, that has been recognized internationally. It was recognized in the Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case back in the 1950s.

What I am suggesting and asking our witness to consider is, if there is implied there an assertion of historic right for a certain population in certain contiguous, adjacent waters, then, obviously, that would be true in areas of his province and in areas of other coastal provinces.

It would appear to me that if we were to discuss the subject of fisheries in the constitutional framework that might be the appropriate milieu to vent whatever differences there may be between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. They could perhaps both benefit from having more say in the definition of the resource and they could thrash out their differences for the benefit of both.

Mr. MacLean: I accept the position of the honourable senator. Perhaps he could assist me in citing the clause in the accord which would indicate that we would not have a transfer of jurisdiction to any one particular province unless, in this particular case, the four Atlantic provinces agreed. If the four Atlantic provinces agreed, then I could accept the position put forward by the honourable senator. Problems have to be worked out, and that could be a good forum. All I am asking for is a safeguard to ensure that the best interests of Nova Scotia are protected when such negotiations take place.

Senator Ottenheimer: I thank the witness. I may have appeared to have been debating with him, but my questions were put with the intention of exchanging information.

Senator Frith: My question, obviously, can only be from the point of view of an ill-informed but guileless Upper Canadian—

Senator Doody: A rare commodity!

Senator Frith: —who only vaguely understands these issues. I am only going to ask for information; I am certainly not going to get into this fight, misunderstanding or discussion between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

I want to touch on the traditional and historic side of the question, which was raised by Senator Ottenheimer, but I will not do that unless there is time at the end of our hearing.

I will combine my other two questions by referring to the hypothetical offshore boundaries chart. It says on the chart, "All boundaries are unofficial, based on the equidistant principle." This hypothetical offshore boundaries exhibit illustrates simply a mathematical set of boundaries. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLean: Correct.

[Senator Ottenheimer.]

Senator Frith: They are not hypothetical in the sense of boundaries that have been discussed as a basis for agreement. These boundaries are simply based on the mathematical equidistant principle and might—I take it the witness is saying—be a starting point for discussion if the matter ever got to that point. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLean: Yes, they are purely hypothetical from a mathematical point of view. However, I would ask you to take a look at the map and try to imagine, for example, how you would divide that piece of territory called the Bay of Fundy between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for fishing purposes. It would create an extremely difficult situation if you were to start drawing provincial lines in Canadian waters.

Senator Frith: I see that a line has been drawn through the Bay of Fundy in this chart.

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Senator Frith: Is that equidistant?

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Senator Frith: I take it that there is not enough fish for everybody within those boundaries, and, to be very specific, if we had those boundaries you feel that 5,000 or 6,000 jobs in Nova Scotia would still be threatened. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLean: If we had those boundaries, Nova Scotia would gain a little in that the Newfoundland fisherman who would normally fish off the Scotian shelf—there are a few—would be, supposedly, excluded from that area, and, if you took the argument to a logical conclusion, Nova Scotians would be excluded from the other. You would have a net loss of approximately that number of jobs, which would be devastating. Of course, for every job lost in Nova Scotia a corresponding job would be created in the Newfoundland fishery.

The major corporations such as National Sea could easily transfer their processing capacity to Newfoundland, but what we would lose would be the jobs on the trawlers that would have been manned by Nova Scotians and the jobs of the fish plant workers which could not be transferred to Newfoundland by Nova Scotians moving to Newfoundland. What it means in a specific sense is that Newfoundland would be able to export its unemployment to Nova Scotia.

I have great sympathy for the very high unemployment rate in Newfoundland as I have for the high unemployment rate in my own province, but I do not think that playing one province against another is a way to generate economic activity in an area that needs a lot of assistance.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, that answers those questions.

I was intrigued by the statement that the tradition of Nova Scotia fishermen fishing those particular waters dates back to the 1700s.

Mr. MacLean: They have been fishing in those waters for over 200 years. Nova Scotia fishermen and Nova Scotia boats have been fishing in those waters, taking back northern cod, having it processed in Nova Scotia plants and then exporting it for sale since then.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, if there is time, I would like to return to that question. Again, I would not be taking sides, I would be merely asking for further intriguing historical information.

Senator Doody: I have a question of clarification on that matter. Who drew this hypothetical map with the equidistant boundaries? Am I correct in assuming that this is not a product of the provinces of Newfoundland or New Brunswick?

Mr. MacLean: I simply took that out of a book to use it as an example. You could move those boundaries mathematically one way or the other. You will also notice that the jurisdiction for France is not included.

The problem you will encounter is how fishermen are going to distinguish those boundaries if you set them up between provinces.

Senator Doody: Perhaps it is even more important to know how the fish are going to distinguish them.

Mr. MacLean: They cannot.

Senator Doody: The point I want to make is that this does not have the official sanction of any particular provincial government or group of governments.

Mr. MacLean: I used it purely as an example.

Senator Frith: If you started negotiations on an equidistant basis, this chart is where you would start. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

The Chairman: The next questioner will be Senator Stewart, followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have two different kinds of questions. I will ask my first questions, which relate to the fisheries, now, and if there is time later I would like to be recognized to ask a question concerning the spending power.

I am not sure that I understand your objection to the inclusion of roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries in the perpetual agenda. Are you saying that the inclusion of this matter on the perpetual agenda raises, until it is satisfied, the possibility of a demand for the transfer of all or part of the jurisdiction with regard to fisheries to Newfoundland, and that this constitutional amendment could be affected by seven of the ten provinces with 50 per cent of the population?

Mr. MacLean: Correct.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Are you also saying, in addition to that, that Newfoundland would have almost irresistible leverage to get seven of the provincial governments to agree because of the extension of the list of matters for which unanimity is required? Newfoundland could say, "Look, unless seven of you agree to give us a share of the fisheries jurisdiction, notwithstanding what the Nova Scotians say, we will veto any proposed amendment with regard to the powers of the Senate. Take us seriously; we will exercise that veto unless our demand is met."

In short, Newfoundland, it would seem, has omnipotence to produce a stalemate on all constitutional amendments of certain kinds or to extract the amendment which you say would be harmful to Nova Scotia. Is that a fair statement of your position? If not, in what way is it defective?

Mr. MacLean: That is exactly the position I attempted to take here today, senator. Let me add one other scenario to that. Let us assume that the majority of Canadian provinces agree to transfer or change the powers of the Senate. Let us assume that they want to have an elected Senate and that all of the provinces are ready to agree. Assume further that Newfoundland simply said, "No, we will not go along with that amendment unless jurisdiction for the fisheries is transferred." What happens then is that seven out of ten provinces could vote to transfer the jurisdiction, but the Premier of Nova Scotia may then be forced to say, "If you attempt to transfer jurisdiction of the fisheries to Newfoundland in this case, I will then be forced to veto an elected Senate."

In effect, what this is really doing is building in a veto for Newfoundland. It is forcing other provinces who may disagree with the transfer also to exercise a veto, which they may not want to use but which they may be forced to use because their backs are against the wall. It is not a very healthy situation.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Your proposal is to solve this by extending the list of matters on which unanimity is required by adding one more heading, namely, "roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries."

Mr. MacLean: There are three possible solutions, senator. First, we could do as the House of Commons has recommended. The committee report recommended that we have fisheries on the agenda only once. Second, we could adopt the amendment that I put forward requiring unanimity, which is not the best solution but is, nevertheless, one solution. Third, we could simply drop fisheries from the agenda. Brian Peckford fought very hard to have that item included on the agenda, and there is no possibility that Newfoundland would agree to its being dropped. Probably there is no possibility that Newfoundland would agree to its being discussed only once.

If, however, the intentions of the Premier of Newfoundland are honourable, then there should be no reason not to include it under the unanimity clause, because it could be brought up. I am sure that if the jurisdiction of the fisheries came up, and the four Atlantic provinces agreed that transfer of some responsibilities was necessary, the remaining provinces would go along with their recommendation, because they would be the ones involved.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You said that a number of jobs might be lost in Nova Scotia, and you mentioned some locations. As to the number of jobs, was it 5,000 or 6,000?

Mr. MacLean: In all of the statements I have been making I have used the figure of 5,000. The seafood producers of Nova Scotia telephoned me to inform me that the number is closer to 6,000. I was therefore being conservative in estimating 5,000. The number is somewhere between the two figures.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You realize that I am a former member of the House of Commons, so I know a certain part of Nova Scotia far better than other parts. You mentioned Canso?

Mr. MacLean: Canso, Louisbourg, Petit-de-Grat, Alder Point, Lunenburg and Liverpool.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What about Port Bickerton? I ask that question because just a week ago I was invited to have some northern cod for dinner. That northern cod, apparently, had just been landed at Port Bickerton. Was I misled?

Mr. MacLean: There are other ports at which the northern cod is landed, but these are the ones that draw a fairly significant portion of the catch from Newfoundland. These would be the ones most drastically affected.

It may be, if this were to happen, that National Sea would decide to close one, two or three plants and concentrate on a couple of plants within the province of Nova Scotia. Louisbourg, for example, may well be the one they decide to keep open. They could transfer the capacity of the others to that port. I do not know the plan of National Sea as to which plants it would close and which it would keep open, but this would have the effect of rippling through the Nova Scotian economy.

I conducted a briefing of municipal leaders in Halifax on Monday. To date 17 municipal councils around the province of Nova Scotia have indicated their support of including the fisheries under the unanimity rule. At the briefing the mayors of Halifax and Dartmouth both indicated that they supported the position that would ensure the safeguarding of Nova Scotia's interests. This was so because, although they were not affected directly by the fisheries, the economic impact upon the province would be so great that it would reverberate into the urban areas.

Senator Marsden: Mr. MacLean, I think that your appearance before us this afternoon is significant not only from the point of view of the substance of your submission but because you are the first member of a provincial legislature to appear as a witness here.

Mr. MacLean: Senator, I did not have the opportunity to appear before the House of Commons committee because my application was rejected.

Senator Marsden: I just checked the record and I see that you made a submission, but did not appear.

Senator Frith: What was that again? Let us make sure that that stands on the record.

Mr. MacLean: I had requested permission to appear before the House of Commons committee, but my request was not granted.

Senator Doody: Was that the joint committee?

Mr. MacLean: Yes, the joint committee.

Senator Marsden: The clarity with which you put forward your concern about gender equality rights in relation to override was very helpful to us all. Did you say that you would be introducing an amendment to that effect in your legislature when it begins its debate on this issue?

Mr. MacLean: I will be introducing a series of amendments when the legislature meets and this comes up for discussion. I read through the five points that Premier Bourassa requested when negotiations opened. I was very careful to word my document today in such a way as not to come into conflict with the constitutional aspirations of Quebec. I think that is another argument which perhaps we could get into another time, but I tried to deal with three points that could be obtained without causing major difficulties with reference to the wording for Quebec or any other province. That is why I limited myself to those three areas.

Senator Marsden: I appreciate that. Am I to understand, then, that the concern with gender equality will be one of the amendments you are proposing?

Mr. MacLean: Yes, I will be proposing that amendment as well as an attempt to gain some clarification on shared-cost programs.

Senator Marsden: I must say that I agreed entirely with your comments on the proposed child-care system. I would like to ask you a second question concerning the province of Nova Scotia.

When the Premier of Nova Scotia attended the Meech Lake conference and the subsequent conference in the Langevin Block, do you know what it was he was asking for on behalf of your province? Further, do you know if he got what he was asking for? After all, Premier Bourassa was very clear about what he wanted, and we know what he got. What about Nova Scotia?

Mr. MacLean: Unfortunately, I do not know if the Premier of Nova Scotia had an agenda or knew clearly what was happening at that particular conference. I know that in order to have this item put on the agenda he came under a great deal of pressure and has attempted to clarify his position. That has not as yet been done satisfactorily. I am not sure what his agenda items were. I do not know if he achieved them. Certainly, from my limited knowledge of what went on during those discussions, he did not seem to have an agenda.

Senator Marsden: I have one final question, if I may. Is there anxiety among your colleagues in the provincial legislature about their role in the Constitution of this country because of executive federalism?

● (1530)

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps you could explain what you mean by "executive federalism."

Senator Marsden: In this case I mean the fact that the premiers and the Prime Minister of the country propose to go on forever more having conferences and making changes of the kind they have made in this case, and promising that their majorities will see to it that these things get through.

Mr. MacLean: I think that it is a very dangerous way to proceed and totally alters a particular vision of the country. I think it is dangerous to have a constitutional conference every year. What other country has a constitutional conference every year to discuss changes in the Constitution? I think that we should have constitutional conferences when they are necessary.

Second, my colleagues in the opposition—at least, the Liberal opposition—are concerned with the idea that the premiers would bind their respective houses in order to ensure support. As a result, I put forward some motions in our Rules Committee which was reforming our rules. As you are aware, most of the legislatures in this country do not have particular clauses dealing with the approval of constitutional amendments. So they are dealt with by simple motion, which in our house could be put at 10 o'clock on a Thursday evening and debated until Saturday night at midnight, under extended rules, and virtually exhaust the opposition; and it would go through with a simple vote.

I have asked that it be treated in similar fashion to a bill, whereby you would vote on the resolution, you would send it to committee—it does not go to committee now—and, after the committee reports, it would come back for final debate and passage.

That was going along just fine until several ministers joined the committee, after they heard that the discussions were ongoing, and voted down the resolution. So, as a result, we will deal with it by a simple motion, which may occupy a few hours of debate, depending on how long the opposition is able to speak. I think that is an unfortunate way to deal with constitutional amendments. It is one that does not affect this chamber but it affects our own. It points out the fact that we do have some concerns in the way that the Constitution is being changed, and we are in an almost hopeless situation in determining how to deal with it.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I have three further names on my list, and I propose that we not add any further names to the list.

Senator Côtteau: My question to the witness concerns that part of the Meech Lake Accord which relates to the fundamental characteristic of Canada, namely, the recognition of the existence of French-speaking people concentrated in Quebec and also living outside of Quebec, and English-speaking Canadians concentrated outside of Quebec but some of whom also live in Quebec.

In my province of Nova Scotia we have a population which is predominantly English-speaking. I doubt very much if there is any fear on the part of the English-speaking people in Nova Scotia as to the preservation and protection of their linguistic rights. But among our population we have a fair number of French-speaking Acadians, who have been struggling to maintain and protect their culture ever since they first landed, which was over 380 years ago.

I should like to ask the witness if, in his view, the text of the Meech Lake Accord offers, in any way, any measure that would enhance and guarantee the protection and preservation of the French culture in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacLean: Senator, from my interpretation of the accord it would seem that Acadians in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would be treated basically as second-class citizens with reference to that particular clause. I say that in view of the fact that the federal government has agreed only that it will preserve the language whereas in the Quebec clause it says "preserve and promote."

I believe there is a responsibility within the federal jurisdiction, in cooperation with the provincial, not only to preserve but also to promote the French language outside of Quebec, in particular in the Atlantic provinces where there is a large Acadian population.

Senator Côtteau: So, Mr. Chairman, if I understand the witness correctly, there is no actual change in the status quo so far as the relationship between the provincial government and the protection of the French language in Nova Scotia is concerned.

Mr. MacLean: That is correct, according to my understanding.

Senator Denis: I was away for a few minutes during your address, Mr. MacLean, for which I apologize. I was glad to hear you say that it was a very good thing to have Quebec sign the Constitution. But in order to accomplish that you referred to a series of omissions from the Constitution.

Would you agree that the conference was called exclusively to discuss the problem of bringing Quebec within the Constitution? I read in a French newspaper, as well as in an English newspaper, that the agenda was dictated by every premier—together with Mr. Mulroney—and that at the conference they would discuss exclusively the entry of Quebec within the Constitution, and that other matters would be dealt with at other conferences. I believe it was stated in the amendment that there would be a conference each year at which the fisheries question and other matters would be discussed. It was suggested that if they discussed the fisheries problem at the Meech Lake conference there would be insufficient time to discuss the Quebec question.

I would like to refer you to the following article which appeared in The Gazette of April 1987. It says:

Prime Minister Mulroney is right. The current round of constitutional talks should concentrate exclusively on the Quebec question.

Further on it says:

It is also to recognize that the more items are loaded on to any given meeting's agenda, the less likely that meeting is to produce positive and coherent results.

There are other problems that could have been discussed at the conference, such as Senate reform and problems concerning Inuit and women. The number of problems could be multiplied. But at the time of the Meech Lake conference it was decided that they would discuss exclusively the question of bringing Quebec within the Constitution.

You agreed that it was a very good thing, yet, in the rest of your address you have said that you were worried about the accord. If questions concerning Senate reform and fisheries were not discussed, would you still be in favour of the amendment in order to bring Quebec within the Constitution? The First Ministers and the Prime Minister said unanimously that there would be no change. They decided that unanimously—not the senators or the leaders of the opposition in the other provinces but the First Ministers and the Prime Minister. They decided that there would be no change.

Mr. MacLean: But, senator, Quebec went into that conference requesting five items, and it received those five items. Why then did other provinces come forward and say, “Yes, we want Quebec in Confederation. We are doing this to entice Quebec into Confederation, to resolve the difficulty of the 1982 act,” and then make their own demands on what they wanted in compensation for signing the accord? It is not the bringing of Quebec into the Constitution that I am arguing about. I support that. I disagree with the requests made by other provinces which have been included in the accord.

● (1540)

Senator Denis: Would you agree that if the First Ministers had discussed and addressed all the problems mentioned—

Mr. MacLean: No, they should not have discussed every problem.

Senator Denis: If they had, there would be no time to discuss the adherence of Quebec to the Constitution. Do you agree?

Mr. MacLean: I agree totally.

Senator Denis: Do you agree that there is agreement to hold First Ministers' conferences to make amendments?

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Senator Denis: At those conferences all the problems mentioned not only by you but other witnesses who have complained about the accord will be discussed. Do you agree that next year the First Ministers could decide to talk about the fisheries problem? The Premier of Alberta wanted to discuss Senate reform. The First Ministers have agreed to postpone these discussions to other conferences.

Mr. MacLean: I agree with the bringing of Quebec into the Constitution, but in doing so there was no need to create other problems not related to bringing Quebec into the Constitution. That is the point I am trying to make here today.

Senator Denis: Perhaps the First Ministers wanted some time to discuss some of these problems and saw this as an opportunity to get agreement on dealing with those discussions. Would you be against the agreement if these inclusions were not in it?

Mr. MacLean: I want Quebec to come into the Constitution, and I will do everything I can to spur that along. However, as an elected official and Leader of the Opposition of my province, I have a responsibility to see to its economy and to see that someone stands up for the best interests of the province. That is why I am here today.

[Senator Denis.]

Senator Denis: I know why you give such answers. It is very hard to answer “yes” or “no”.

Senator Frith: It depends on how the question is phrased.

Senator Doody: My question is pretty well the same as the question asked by Senator Denis. I note with pleasure that Mr. MacLean and others are on record in support of Quebec's return to the constitutional fold, as it were, and I congratulate him on supporting that effort. I wonder, though, if the concerns he has raised here today and his announcement of proposing amendments to the accord might not mean that we could lose the accord. People who have appeared before this committee have been quoted elsewhere as saying that there is a possibility that if the accord is re-opened it will never be reclosed, as it were. Various reputable witnesses have expressed that opinion.

Would it not be better, perhaps, to pass the accord as it is now and deal with the other problems at the next round? It seems to me that the major objective in this particular round is to include the province of Quebec in the Canadian scene. Having accomplished that result, it would seem to me that the logical way to go is to take the next step at the next round. Would you not agree with that?

Mr. MacLean: I have difficulty with that proposal, because, as I have stated on a number of occasions, including twice here today, it ignores the simple question of “What does fish have to do with getting Quebec into the Constitution?” Fish really has nothing to do with the matter at all, except that Brian Peckford demanded that it be placed on the permanent agenda before he would agree to the Meech Lake Accord. Unfortunately, that places the economy of Nova Scotia in a very delicate position. If we were to, for example, on fish alone, pass that very simple amendment, then the ball is very squarely in Brian Peckford's court. If he says, “Well, fine, we are prepared to have the unanimity rule apply to the area of fisheries, and we can discuss it,” there would be no problem, because the provinces do not have difficulty with the matter. It is basically a matter between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. If, on the other hand, Mr. Peckford were to say, “No, I refuse to include the unanimity rule,” then, unfortunately, the worst fears of Nova Scotia would be confirmed. I could not support the accord under those circumstances.

Senator Frith: And neither position has anything to do with Quebec.

Mr. MacLean: That is correct.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I had promised myself that I would not talk about fish at all. I have deliberately tried to avoid the subject. However, I have spent every year since I have been in public life, prior to my arrival in this place, going to various federal-provincial conferences. Without exception, we, the delegation from Newfoundland, attempted seriously to get fish on the agenda and seriously requested that it be considered as a national issue, not necessarily as a Newfoundland, Nova Scotia or provincial issue but as a national issue. In terms of the economy, and even in terms of the very reason of its being, fish is synonymous with the island province of Newfoundland.

I noted here today with some interest that our witness told us that only in three of the last ten federal-provincial conferences was the premier of the province successful in getting the matter discussed. I say to him, congratulations, because he is really getting the matter discussed now. The final outcome remains to be seen, and I hope that the Canadian nation will deal with the matter as a whole. However, thanks be to God that Brian Peckford has managed to raise the fishery to a national issue, and I hope it will continue to be discussed as a national issue. I thank you, sir, for emphasizing that fact here today.

Senator Frith: And you should thank the Senate for setting up this Committee of the Whole so that you could make your point.

Senator Doody: I hope the record will show that Senator Frith said that.

The Chairman: Senator Frith and Senator Stewart have asked for a second round of questioning, but unfortunately time does not permit it.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and honourable senators for allowing me to appear here today and for your very kind attention.

The Chairman: Mr. MacLean, we thank you for the work you put into your presentation and for coming to be with us today.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Dr. John A. Simms and Mr. Collin Irving were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Our next witnesses are from the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards. The association has provided us with a brief in advance, and it has been distributed to members of the committee. The two witnesses from the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards are Dr. John A. Simms, President, and Mr. Colin Irving, legal counsel.

Mr. Simms, will both of you be speaking?

Dr. John A. Simms, President, Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards (Montreal): Mr. Chairman, both of us will be speaking.

The Chairman: Our practice is to hear a presentation from the witnesses and to leave enough time for questioning by senators. We have at our disposal one hour. There are other witnesses after you, so I shall have to try and keep within that time limit. You may proceed.

Dr. Simms: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I should first introduce myself. I am the Reverend Dr. John Simms, President of the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards. Seated to my left is Colin Irving, who is legal counsel for the association and who has represented us on numerous occasions over the past ten years in constitutional actions before the courts in Quebec and Ontario and the Supreme Court of Canada here in Ottawa.

The Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards represents 28 school boards in Quebec which serve some 80,000 children, the majority of whom are English. The system of English language instruction is endangered by the provisions which are contained in the Meech Lake Accord, and with the interpretation given to these clauses by the Government of Quebec we fear for the future of our system. These are not idle words but, rather, ones which we have considered carefully. The English community in Quebec has been, and is being, ignored by the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers who signed the accord, and this is a shame.

As we have said in our brief, Quebec has had since the 1840s—and has to this day—a system of Protestant schools throughout the province. These schools, with the exception of those in Montreal and Quebec City, were under the control and management of locally-elected school commissioners and trustees. These elected persons established the schools, levied the taxes for their construction and operation, hired the staff to operate them, and saw to the education of the children who attended the schools. There were schools established and operated by the English Protestant community wherever those persons were found throughout the province. One point must be made very clear here today: Our schools were not established because of a system of provincial government grants or largesse but, rather, because our parents and grandparents wanted them and were willing to pay for them. Our position is different from the linguistic minorities in other provinces, which are now demanding that their provincial governments establish schools for them. We have always had our educational institutions, and they belong to us. We built them and paid for them, and that fact should not be forgotten.

Our system did not flourish in past years because of the generosity of provincial governments. While it must be noted that succeeding governments in Quebec in the century following Confederation behaved with great tolerance and never sought to discriminate against the English minority in educational matters, the record clearly shows that until the 1960s the Protestant community funded its own schools almost entirely. Government grants in those years represented less than 10 per cent of the total expenses.

As I have said, the Protestant School Board in Quebec was basically an English-language system until the 1970s. In 1970 there were only four French Protestant schools operating in the Montreal area. Today, province-wide, there are 43 elementary French language schools and 15 secondary schools in the Protestant system, having a total enrolment of some 14,000 students.

The impact of events of the last decade or so, of which you are all aware, is illustrated even more dramatically by the plummeting enrolment in the English-language Protestant sector. There were approximately 120,000 English students within Quebec in the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards in 1976. By 1985 there were only 66,000, a loss of almost 50 per cent in only ten years.

It is not necessary for me to review with you why this took place; merely to state the obvious and refer you to the provisions of Bill 101 containing the restrictions on the right to English education in Quebec. Access was basically limited to children legally in the system at the time of the passage of the legislation, or to children of parents who had themselves received their elementary education in English in Quebec. Other English Canadians were excluded.

With the proclamation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 our association took the initiative to determine whether the provisions of section 23(1)(b) and section 23(2) of the Charter took precedence over the provisions of chapter VIII of Bill 101. The Supreme Court of Canada found in favour of section 23(1)(b) and section 23(2) of the Charter. It should be noted that this action was entirely funded by our association, without one cent of financial assistance from either the federal or the provincial governments. This defence of the rights of Canadians was paid for by the Protestant School Boards from the donations and the taxes of their adherents.

Was this, then, the end of the restrictions? The answer is no. Since 1984 new qualifications and restrictions have been imposed upon those seeking English-language instruction, even though they qualify under sections 23(1)(b) and section 23(2) of the Charter. In addition, statements have been made—and these are contained in our brief—by both the Premier of Quebec and his education minister, Mr. Claude Ryan, that these restrictions will be further strengthened. None of these is valid if you read the wording of sections 23(1)(b) or 23(2), but until the courts decide on these matters they apply, and their application restricts access to our English schools, with the result that these schools continue to close as our population base erodes and disappears.

We have challenged the validity of the new restrictions before the courts—again on our own. We believe that if there were genuine concern in Ottawa for the rights of the English minority in Quebec then someone would have known about the conditions under which we are operating, and an attempt would have been made to ensure the viability of our English school system by requiring that the full provision of section 23 be made available to all Canadians by deleting the provisions of section 59 from the Charter.

At this time I should also like to say something about the phrase “the distinct society” and its ramifications for the future. As Mr. Irving has pointed out in his article, which was published in its entirety in the December 29, 1987, edition of the Globe and Mail—a portion of which is quoted in our brief:

There is confusion as to what it means.

Mr. Bourassa, the Premier of Quebec, has stated that it means that Quebec is protected against any laws, and that its powers over language are supreme. On the other hand, Jacques-Yvan Morin, a former cabinet minister with the Parti Québécois and a professor of constitutional law at the present time, says that it will afford protection for the minority group in Quebec; that is, the English-speaking group.

[Dr Simms.]

So, who is correct? If Mr. Bourassa is correct, and the position of Quebec is strengthened regarding the protection of the French language, can we expect stronger measures which will infringe upon our linguistic position? If Mr. Morin is correct, then the French population may well feel betrayed and more alienated from the constitutional process. Surely the politicians owe us a clear explanation of the meaning of the accord.

Speaking of the politicians, we must say something about the constitutional process that gave us the accord, and about the future of constitutional change in Canada. Eleven individuals met and agreed to change the Constitution. Constitutions are not something that should be treated as normal legislation. Where is the constitutional process? Where is the consultation? By what mandate do those 11 decide our future? Who speaks for the English of Quebec during these meetings? Not the Government of Quebec; not the federal government, and certainly not the other nine premiers. We are ignored. We represent possibly five or six seats in the National Assembly, and the same in Ottawa; we are obviously unimportant. But remember that the non-francophone minority in Quebec is larger in number than the population of six of the ten provinces of Canada.

In an article published in the Montreal Gazette on January 18, 1988, Senator Murray said, and I quote:

In 1987, the National Assembly embraced the legitimacy of the Canada clause education rights as well as the rest of the charter. It also approved the recognition that the presence of English-speaking Canadians in Quebec constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

This affirmation of the pluralistic nature of Quebec society is an advance for those who have followed the evolution of the language debate in Quebec over the past 20 years, and it should be welcomed.

Under the Meech Lake Accord, the recognition of Quebec's distinct society is carefully balanced with a recognition of linguistic duality within Quebec and throughout Canada. Moreover, as Quebec is the only province in which they are a minority, English-speaking Canadians clearly are part of what makes Quebec a distinct society.

A reading of what Mr. Bourassa has said in the National Assembly and some familiarity with recent events in Quebec indicates that the embrace is rather limited. Mr. Bourassa did say that Quebec accepts section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, but it must be borne in mind that it was necessary to bring a court case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada to achieve this result.

Speaking on education rights, Senator Murray is careful to say that Quebec has accepted Canada clause education rights. This is true, but there are three parts to section 23 of the Charter of which the Canada clause is only one. Paragraph 23(1)(a), which deals with mother tongue, is not in force in Quebec. Mr. Bourassa has made it clear that it will not be brought into force. There will thus be perpetuated a situation in which a person whose mother tongue is French will have rights in all the Canadian provinces which are denied to citizens in Quebec whose mother tongue is English.

Section 23 also provides that citizens who have a child who has received education in English anywhere in Canada are entitled to have all their children receive education in English in Quebec. This position is not accepted by the present government. Anyone who thinks that linguistic duality within Quebec was enhanced by the Meech Lake Accord, as the Government of Quebec sees it, has parted company with reality. It is sufficient to read Mr. Bourassa's statement to see how he understands the position.

Those of us who have chosen to live in Quebec and serve the children entrusted to us have done so with a sense of history and with the belief that we are part of that society. We are prepared to continue to live and work in Quebec. We only wish that some of those who signed the accord had been aware of what we were and who we are—members of the linguistic minority and the distinct society, which is Quebec.

Before I complete my remarks I would like to congratulate members of the Senate on these hearings. We look to the Senate of Canada as an intelligent and informed body, and we are delighted to come before you today.

The Chairman: Thank you, Dr. Simms. I believe that Mr. Irving has some matters to add.

Mr. Colin Irving, Legal Counsel, Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards (Montreal): No. Dr. Simms has given the statement for the association. I will assist in answering questions.

The Chairman: Thank you. I am now open to questioners. Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Grafstein.

Senator Marsden: Your brief raises, in a very forceful way, a matter of concern which has been expressed—although perhaps not quite as clearly as you have expressed it—by other witnesses who have appeared before this committee.

My question has to do with the process that you are undertaking more than with the content. As you may know, there is a select committee of the Ontario Legislature which plans to travel to Quebec as part of its work. As you say on page 11 of your written brief, you are convinced that the provincial premiers and the great majority of the members of Parliament who have adopted the accord are under the impression that the linguistic minority is secure and that nothing remains to be done to ensure its survival. Do you have plans to appear before the Ontario select committee and straighten out the record?

Dr. Simms: We have no plans to appear before them at this point, but certainly if there is an opportunity we will be prepared to take advantage of it.

Senator Marsden: You talk about the vagueness of the distinct society clause and your part of the distinctiveness. Am I to understand that you are recommending that that clause be defined?

Mr. Irving: I suppose you could say it is partly a question of definition. Our view is that when you read the accord—particularly the whole of section 2—it is entirely unclear as to what the agreement really is. In fact, it seems to us that there is no agreement at all. There is agreement on a form of words, which are the ones you see there, but the people who wrote those words do not agree at all on what they mean.

Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Hatfield, Senator Murray and numerous others are taking absolutely diametrically opposing views on the meaning. To my mind that is not an agreement. An agreement is when people agree on something. There is no agreement here. It would appear as a political matter that there is not going to be a change in those words.

We would very much hope that somebody—such as this chamber—would call on those who wrote those words to say openly what they mean. If that does not happen, we have arrived at a process where the Constitution has been amended in a way that nobody is sure of. The only agreement is that whatever the Supreme Court of Canada can make of these words is going to be the new Constitution.

This is not a place for legal arguments. However, very strong legal arguments could be made on either side of the issue as to whether or not the distinct society clause overrides the Canadian Charter.

In answer to your question, we are really asking someone in authority to call for clarification before there is no longer any opportunity.

Dr. Simms: One of the great arguments put forward in support of the Meech Lake Accord in Quebec, and support for the factum that is now before the Supreme Court regarding signs in French only, with no English or other languages, is a phrase called "social peace." We always seem to go back to this aspect of social peace. The point that I was making in my opening remarks is that Mr. Bourassa, Lise Bacon and others believe one thing. Jacques-Yvan Morin and a number of others outside of Quebec believe another thing. If it is interpreted, for example, in favour of the English-speaking people in Quebec, as Jacques-Yvan Morin has said, that we believe in a bilingual Quebec, then there will be no social peace. It will wreak havoc with our social life. There will be less social peace as a result of the Meech Lake Accord. Mr. Jacques-Yvan Morin is a constitutional authority, teaching at the University of Montreal. He says that Quebec has been a bilingual society since the 1700s. If the distinct society that is Quebec means that and is interpreted in the courts as that, then we say there will be little social peace.

The Chairman: The next person on my list is Senator Grafstein, followed by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

Senator Grafstein: What percentage of the population of Quebec do the English-speaking minority represent? Do you know the answer to that question?

• (1610)

Mr. Irving: Do you mean in the school system or the overall population?

Senator Grafstein: Both.

Dr. Simms: Depending on who gathers the statistics, there are from 800,000 to a million Anglophones in Quebec.

Senator Grafstein: What percentage would that be in the school system, and what percentage would that be of the overall population? Could you give us a rough idea?

Dr. Simms: The figure is approximately 6.5 million for the total population, and for the school system we have used the figure of 13.7 per cent. I think that that is still true.

Senator Grafstein: So that if you compared the Manitoba language question and the education question that followed that and the minority percentage in Quebec as it bears to the total, in Quebec it would be larger than it was, and is, in Manitoba. So you represent a much larger minority in the same situation.

Dr. Simms: We are very much alike.

Senator Grafstein: Have you, then, examined your ability to defend your rights under the Charter, when one compares the rights that francophone Manitobans have in the province of Manitoba as compared to the rights that the anglophone minority have in the province of Quebec respecting the equality provisions? Have you examined that to see whether or not that gives you some ability to defend yourself in a way that you are suggesting is not properly made defensible by Meech Lake?

We have been told by the premiers of the provinces that they would be concerned if the Charter were diminished. They are satisfied—but many disagree with this position—that the Charter is paramount and, therefore, you have some protection in the Charter to defend your particular interests.

Mr. Irving: First of all, the position of the Government of Quebec is that the Charter is not paramount. That is what Premier Bourassa has said. Second, the protection as far as schooling is concerned lies in section 23 of the Charter and section 93 of the Constitution Act of 1867, because the Protestant school system is a denominational school system in the province of Quebec.

The numbers in the system are certainly sufficient at the moment to support a school system and to mount a defence of our rights, and that is just as well, because we have been continuously in court for some years now.

On that question of percentages, when the Charter was enacted, the Government of Quebec sent around a circular saying that, notwithstanding the Canadian Charter, no one will be accepted in an English school who does not qualify under Bill 101. That provoked the court case in which Quebec took the position that section 1 of the Charter allowed Quebec to limit the rights of section 23. The figures used were very interesting. I am now referring to figures put forward by the Quebec government.

The forecast at that time was that, although the English school system represented 13.7 per cent of the total enrolment in schools in Quebec, by 1995 or thereabouts—I will not swear to the exact date—that would be reduced, without the impact of the Canadian Charter, to approximately 6.1 per cent. The Quebec government's own statistics were that if the Canadian Charter were brought in the reduction would be to only 6.7 per cent. It was still argued that that extra .5 per cent was intolerable and justified the exclusion of the Canada clause.

[Senator Grafstein.]

It is with that sort of background, and the restrictions you see mentioned in the brief, that the Quebec association has to approach any constitutional document which seems to suggest, as this one does, that rights under the Charter are going to be eroded. Rights under the Charter, as we see them, are fairly minimal already, considering that the first part of section 23 does not apply in Quebec. Clearly Quebec now intends—it said so—to get rid of the last part of section 23, which is the sibling clause, which Mr. Ryan, as you can see from the brief, describes as an échappatoire.

We see it as the basic right of a family living in any other province and moving to Quebec to continue educating their children in English.

I am not sure that that answers your question, senator, but we see section 23 as the main defence for English language rights. I am rather doubtful that the equality sections would assist.

As far as denominational school rights are concerned, section 93 is the protection, and the Government of Quebec has already indicated that it wants to get rid of section 93.

Senator Grafstein: So you are saying that the specific provisions would take priority over the general provisions in terms of interrupting the rights that you are seeking to maintain?

Mr. Irving: Yes. Where there are specific provisions in the Charter, it could certainly be strenuously argued that that excludes anything more general.

Senator Grafstein: Following on Senator Marsden's point, I take it that you have not considered making a similar presentation to the Province of Manitoba on this particular point, or to the Province of New Brunswick. It strikes me that in both of those provinces there is a similar situation, and that they might be interested in this. Obviously this is important information and not generally made available outside of the province of Quebec in a manner as clear as you have presented it today. It might be useful for the legislatures of those two provinces to examine, in theory, the equality provisions, if not in practice, if that is your suggestion.

Finally, assuming we decided that we wanted to examine specific amendments that would be within "the spirit" of Meech Lake—which is to bring Quebec in—because we are not satisfied that the spirit is met by the specifics, which appears to be the concern of many groups that have appeared before this committee and other bodies—would you have a list of specific amendments that would alleviate the inequality that you are suggesting?

Mr. Irving: We do not have any in written form, senator. We would certainly like to see section 16 deleted or amended so as to provide that the provisions of section 2 do not affect rights under the Canadian Charter. There is a strong inference from the language of section 16 that other parts of the Charter, or, indeed, the Constitution Act of 1867, which are not mentioned are affected. There is even an inference to be drawn that the federal legislative power is affected, because it is thought necessary to mention section 91.24 specifically.

Senator Frith: In fact, one is just as strong as the other.

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Frith: If one reads it that way, it affects legislative jurisdiction just as strongly as it affects the Charter.

Mr. Irving: Except for section 2, subparagraph 4, which seems to say clearly that nothing in section 2 derogates from any rights of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Frith: True.

Mr. Irving: One could still say, "Well, if that's so, why on earth is it necessary to refer specifically to section 91.24?"

Our feeling is that it is necessary to start over again with this. As my Scottish grandmother used to say, you cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. It is difficult to change the language to get greater clarity. We want clear recognition that the Canadian Charter is not affected and clear recognition that the legislative authority is not affected either. But that comes back, unfortunately, to the position we took in the first place—the parties do not agree on that. On the one side, there are many authors of this document saying, "We did not intend to disturb the Charter and we did not." And then there are people, who supposedly have agreed with them, saying, "We did intend to disturb the Charter and we have." In our submission, that is simply an intolerable situation.

Getting rid of section 16 would certainly improve this, but I would have thought it would be necessary to go back to the parties who came to the agreement and have them put their heads back together to see if they really agree at all.

Dr. Simms: Those who support passing it as is make a great deal of the fact that it is important to have Quebec embrace Canada and the Constitution. The Constitution Act of 1982 has not been embraced. It is our feeling that this is the appropriate time to do that, if that is what is intended.

● (1620)

We feel, in fact, that in the referendum of 1980 Quebec embraced Canada. There was a full vote by the whole province, and some 60 per cent of the province said, "We are embracing Canada; we are embracing federalism." That embrace took place at that time. Now the politicians are telling us, "Well, we will embrace you somewhat." But when it comes to the Charter of 1982, first, we have section 23(a), which they will not embrace or accept, which means that French people in other parts of Canada have rights that the English mother tongue people in Quebec do not have and will not have. Second, section 33 is a notwithstanding clause, and Quebec invokes the notwithstanding clause. Finally, section 59 states that it will not come into force until the National Assembly says so, and they are not about to do that. In fact, if we listed and read in our statements some of the things that Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Claude Ryan, the Minister of Education, have said, they are dubious about accepting section 93, section 23(1)(b) or 23(2) in the future. At the next constitutional meeting they would, perhaps, like to have done with these. The process is wrong. If this is what continues, we are not represented at that process. We feel that the so-called embrace of Quebec to Canada is just not happening.

The Chairman: Does that conclude your questioning, Senator Grafstein?

Senator Grafstein: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Grafstein. Next is Senator Stewart, followed by Senator LeBlanc.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You say that you would like someone—probably the Senate—to call for those who drew up this document to say what the expression "distinct society" means. There have been many requests here in the Senate for help in interpreting these words. However, Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate—a person who understands this document about as well as anyone—tells us that that is a question that will be answered by the courts.

We recently had an example, in the abortion decision case, of what happens when uncertain legal situations are left in the hands of the court. We were reminded here last week of a saying by Oliver Wendell Holmes that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is. That brings us to the question of the composition of the Supreme Court. It is about that matter that I want to ask you.

The accord provides that at least three of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are to be persons who have been admitted to the bar of Quebec. Of that number—"three or more"—three are to be nominated by the Government of the province of Quebec. The remainder of the nine judges are to be selected from persons nominated by the governments in the other provinces.

I happen to be a senator from Nova Scotia, and I am assuming that Quebec will have three—perhaps more, but let us say three—and that Ontario will feel that it should have at least equal treatment with Quebec now that the Supreme Court of Canada is becoming the body that will decide what the Constitution is. I wonder, then, what about the rest of us? I assume that the Government of the province of Nova Scotia will say, from time to time, "It is our turn. We are being slighted in our representation in a body which now is making not simply legal decisions but political decisions of the highest nature." Is this a matter which concerns you? I realize that you have a particular viewpoint and that you see this proposed accord from that viewpoint. Is this matter of provincializing the Supreme Court of Canada a matter which concerns you?

Mr. Irving: Yes, it certainly concerns me very much. Let me go back to where you started from, senator.

If Senator Murray really said that the words do not matter, because the court will determine what they mean, then surely we have arrived at something of an impasse. It is not supposed to be the court that decides what the Constitution is; it is supposed to be the legislatures or the people. That comes back to what I was saying originally: You can agree on anything if it is vague enough, and say, "All right, we have agreed, and we will let the judges struggle with it as they may." That process politicizes the court even further, and the more political the court gets the easier it is to have its position undermined. This will be a step in that direction, because, if the Supreme Court of Canada were to say, for example, that, contrary to Mr. Bourassa's expectations, Quebec legislation will have to respect the Charter, there will be considerable criticism of the court from Quebec, and it is the court rather than the responsible people which will end up with the opprobrium.

The other part of it, the naming of the judges, is, as I see it, a further step in that direction. The tendency will inevitably be—in Quebec at least—to name judges whose position on issues which are dear to the heart of the province are already known. It is important that the Supreme Court of Canada should get judges—because it has to represent the entire country—who are best suited to the work of that court, which is not always making decisions on constitutional issues. There is room for a complete impasse in the new provisions, because Ottawa must pick, but Quebec must provide the lists.

Might I say that the practice in recent years has been—because of one or two bad experiences—that only sitting judges are named to the Supreme Court of Canada. They tried practising lawyers and found that sometimes they did not like being judges and resigned quickly. Now they will only name a sitting judge. The curious result is that, as far as Quebec is concerned, the federal government will only want judges who are now sitting on the Quebec Court of Appeal—all of whom are named by the federal government, without the participation of the province—but the province has to name the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. You can imagine how likely they are to name a series of judges who originally were named by the federal government. It invites impasse and chaos. However, there has always been a political argument among the provinces as to when they are due to have a seat on the court, because Quebec and Ontario have always had three. There are usually two from the West and one from the eastern provinces.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But that argument will now be embittered by reason of the important new power of the court.

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Have you done an analysis of the voting behaviour of judges in the cases which have concerned you, as decided by the Supreme Court, to ascertain whether there has been any representation of a provincial viewpoint? Have the judges been quite neutral?

Mr. Irving: I would say the judges have been quite neutral. You can certainly do analyses—and some have been done—of areas like criminal law. Twenty-five years ago when Mr. Justice Fauteux and Mr. Justice Cartwright sat on the court, one of them almost never voted in favour of anyone charged with an offence and the other voted in the opposite way.

[Senator Irving.]

Differences certainly arise as a result of judges' personal feelings. However, at the moment I do not believe there is any bias of that kind in favour of or against federal-provincial jurisdiction, but it might develop.

• (1630)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are saying that up to this point in time judges have been quite neutral, but that you anticipate, with the new method of selection, that the judges will be nominated by reason of their prejudices, in the old sense of the word, that is, that they will hold prejudgments, and that this will then be reflected in their decisions.

Mr. Irving: It might be. I would not want to question the goodwill of the people who have that responsibility in the future. However, this invites it, and I do not see why it is necessary.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I have time for another question. If so, I would like to ask one.

The Chairman: Yes, I think we have time. I have one more questioner. That is Senator LeBlanc.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): My question concerns subsection (4) of the proposed new section 2, which states:

Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, . . .

That seems to mean that there will be no change in the constitutional significance of sections 91 and 92. However, last week Professor Ann Bayefsky, who testified here—and I would refer to her testimony which appears on page 2576 of the Debates of the Senate—dealt with the implications of that proposed subsection. She said that although the wording of those sections would not be changed, there is real reason to believe that there will be a new style of interpretation. In other words, insofar as sections 91 and 92 are concerned, the judges will once again be saying what the Constitution is, and that they are now being put on a new tack, one that is different from the tack which has prevailed in the past. Do you agree with Professor Bayefsky, or is she raising the possibility of innovation there in a way that it ought not to be raised?

Mr. Irving: On reading the proposed subsection (4) I would think that it does not mean anything more than it says, and that its only effect is simply to preserve untouched the legislative and executive jurisdictions of both levels of government.

However, might I say that it is that particular subclause (4) that the Quebec government thinks is so very significant. I lose their argument, as I read it, but let me just read you a translation of what Mr. Bourassa said when he was speaking to the National Assembly. He said:

I will say to the Leader of the Opposition . . . that the fourth paragraph of this clause, dealing specifically with language, is a derogatory clause or a specific safety clause, which according to unanimous legal opinions, is watertight.

Thus, contrary to what could have been said, it will no longer be possible to interpret the constitutional provision—

That is, the earlier one.

—between the duality and promotion of a distinct society and it will no longer be possible to interpret it contrary to the powers of the Government of Québec as regards the protection of the French language.

The inclusion of the word “language”— which you will see at the end of subclause 4

—which was deliberate and intentional—affirms the watertight nature of this clause. I will also say that because the use of the term “derogate” rather than “change” was discussed for at least one hour, we called in legal experts to find out the exact meaning of all these terms . . . It is precisely because we did not use the term “alter” or “change” but rather “derogate” that Québec is protected against any loss; it can only gain.

I must confess that I am puzzled by that. I do not see where that comes from in terms of subclause (4). However, it again underlines what we see as the main difficulty with this, and that is that there are widely divergent opinions on the meaning.

Clearly the Quebec government thinks that that is the most important subsection in the proposed section 2 and that it protects their position absolutely. I, myself, have trouble seeing that it will have any effect other than the one I mentioned in the beginning. Therefore, I think I would not agree with the earlier submission you referred to, but, again, somebody does. Various people think this is most important.

The Chairman: Does that conclude your questioning, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I would be prepared to go a little further, but I think you have been very generous with the time, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I now call on Senator LeBlanc.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, I listened with considerable interest to the presentation. There are many points I would like to make, but I know we are running out of time. However, because I am a New Brunswicker, I read very carefully the statements made by Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Remillard in their own assembly and, unless I do not read French in the same way as they speak it, I think either the Charter or the understanding of the assembly from what they said is going to be in trouble. As Senator Forsey said, “Somebody is going to get an awful surprise.”

Senator Frith: And be very angry.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Certainly, if what Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Remillard said is the interpretation of the Province of Quebec, it has implications for minorities outside of Quebec. They made it very clear that there was only one “distinct society,” and that there would not be two, three or four.

Some of us Acadians, who arrived in Canada in 1603, before the foundation of Quebec, might have other claims, but that is another issue which I will not go into.

I listened with interest to a comment, which you attributed to Senator Murray, to the effect that it would be left to the courts to interpret.

Dr. Simms: I believe Senator Stewart said that.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): It seems to me that if we want the courts to interpret what we have frozen ourselves into the logic would be for us to agitate to have the court do what it did in 1981-82, which was to give an interpretation before the Constitution was finalized in 1981-82.

I was also somewhat concerned by the use of the words “social peace,” because one thing that I, as a member of a minority group, discovered a long time ago is that minorities never get ahead very much if peace is their overriding approach to problems.

As a pretty substantive minority, which surely must have some friends in other places in Canada, why would you not ask that we know, in fact, what “distinct society” will mean in relation to the Charter before we get frozen into the Meech Lake Accord?

Dr. Simms: One of the things the Senate could do would be to ask some of the people who put the Meech Lake Accord together to come and explain it themselves.

To the senator from Antigonish-Guysborough I would mention that I originally came from Glasgow, and have played the bagpipes at the Highland Games on occasion. People often smile at the name “Antigonish,” but if you ask those who originally coined the name you will find that it simply means berry eating from a berry bush. Those who coined the name knew what it meant. It would be well for Canada to have some official statement somewhere from those who put the Meech Lake Accord together as to what they think it means.

Mr. Irving: That is what we are trying to do, senator, in any way we can. We are trying to call upon those who wrote this accord to say what they meant by it. This is surely an extraordinary situation—11 people, working to a very rigid deadline, for some reason, have produced a document and cannot tell us what they mean by what they say. That is not acceptable. They do not agree. They cannot, or will not, tell us.

Looking at it from the perspective of the minority of Quebec—and I would think it would be the same perspective as that of the French minorities of other provinces—one would seriously have to ask whether anyone was looking out for minority interests when this agreement was drafted.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Perhaps I could rephrase my question. It is precisely because I do not believe that the politicians who committed themselves to Meech Lake will swallow themselves to the point where they will reverse their positions that I raise this point. Some people have come up with this mystical view that Meech Lake is an uninterrupted flow, and there was an expression used, a "seamless—"

Senator Frith: Web.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Well, the seamless stuff that I know is saran wrap and aluminum foil. I don't think this is a particularly good material to construct anything out of. I think this "seamless web" we are talking about had better be understood and explained. That is why, since I do not have any confidence that the political process will provide the explanation other than in vague terms and generalities, I think it would be useful, before we are frozen into an immovable position, to know how the court will interpret this agreement. Surely we should be agitating for a reference to the court.

I repeat that I am not a lawyer, and I am sure there are a hundred technical objections to what I am suggesting. But I am an ordinary citizen who likes to know, before he is immobilized forever in a constitution, at least what was the straitjacket that was put on him.

Mr. Irving: The difficulty is that a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada can only be done by the government, and I do not think the government intends to do that. Might I suggest a perfectly simple question which anyone would be hard pressed to object to answering? It is a question posed to those who wrote the accord: Do they intend, by the words they used, to empower Quebec to pass legislation to promote the French language in Quebec which will override the Canadian Charter of Rights or any part of it? That is a perfectly simple question. It is not a question of what the language means; it is a question of what they intended. They know what they intended, and surely they should be able to answer that question.

I would suggest that it is no answer to say that the court will decide that. That is not what the court is there for. As we see it, the answer to that question is just as important to the majority in Quebec, which has serious concerns about the survival of its language—and they are real concerns—as it is for the minority in Quebec.

Senator Frith: I would like to go one step further along the path explored by Senators Stewart and LeBlanc. You have been studying this issue from the perspective of the province of Quebec. It seems to me that the position of the Quebec government is that the accord will provide a great advance for Quebec, because section 16 means that powers under section 2 will override the Charter. The other provinces are being told, on gender rights, for example, that that is not so. The impression one gets from the centre, so to speak, is that Quebec has one interpretation—namely, the one that the other provinces seem to fear—and that the others are being told that there is nothing to fear.

If that is right, if that is what Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Rémiillard seem to have said—and I would like your assurance that they have said that—doesn't somebody have to end up angry when the interpretation is finally given for one side or the other? Either the people of Quebec are going to feel that they have been "had," because they think they were given something important, or the others are going to be angry, because they were reassured that Quebec did not obtain anything that meant that certain legislation would override the Charter. Is our impression correct, as you understand the Quebec position?

Mr. Irving: You have expressed our concern exactly, senator, that the two groups, both dealing with the same documents, are saying entirely different things. There cannot be any happy outcome under those circumstances. As you put it, either Quebec is going to feel that it has been "had," that it came away from this agreement thinking it had powers in respect of the distinct identity of Quebec which it finds it does not have, or the Charter of Rights in Quebec will be eroded, and very likely the position of the French-speaking minorities in other provinces will be less well protected. It can only be one of the two results, as you say.

Senator Frith: That, therefore, cannot result in peace.

Mr. Irving: No, it cannot.

The Chairman: That, then, concludes my list of questioners. On behalf of honourable senators, I want to thank Dr. Simms and Mr. Irving for their valuable contribution to our work.

Dr. Simms: We thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, for hearing us today.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, our next witnesses represent Canadian Parents for French. We are pleased to welcome this afternoon Dr. Susan Purdy, the National President, and Mrs. Kathryn Manzer, the former Vice-President of this organization.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Dr. Susan Purdy and Mrs. Kathryn Manzer were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Our normal procedure, ladies, is to have you proceed with your brief, after which senators may put questions. We have at our disposal one hour, and I will have to be strict on that hour, because according to our rules we must rise no later than 6 o'clock. Please proceed, Dr. Purdy.

Dr. Susan Purdy, National President, Canadian Parents for French: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I would first like to thank you very much for this opportunity to appear before you and to place on the record of this house the concerns of another minority within this country.

Canadian Parents for French is a national voluntary organization representing more than 17,000 individuals active in 190 communities in all of the provinces and in both territories. In addition, it speaks for another 4,000 individuals through its 56 associate member organizations.

● (1650)

Our goals are set out before you. I will not bother reading them. In keeping with our mandate, we wish to limit our comments to those sections of the Constitutional Accord which deal with the official languages of Canada. In telegrams to the Prime Minister and the premiers, prior to the signing of the so-called Langevin text, CPF asked that the Government of Canada and the governments of all of the provinces undertake to actively promote the two official languages of Canada. Unfortunately, they did not see fit to follow that course.

While the Government of Quebec undertook to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec—defined as a distinct society, where French-speaking Canadians are centred, although not exclusively, and where anglophone Canadians are present, although concentrated outside of the province—the Government of Canada and the other provincial governments undertook only to protect the fundamental linguistic nature of Canada. This limitation was merely an undertaking to preserve the status quo or less outside of Quebec. Anyone sincerely committed to seeking the improvement of opportunities in French, either as a first or second language, will attest that the status quo is not acceptable. Assimilation of the minority will continue unabated if this position is not modified. Statistical information on the assimilation of minority official language speakers, and the growth of bilingual populations in Canada, is appended for your information at the end of this report.

In the majority of the anglophone provinces there are insufficient schools in which young Francophones can receive education in their own language. In some communities this results in a necessity to share a school with Anglophones—a situation which is generally unacceptable, for pedagogical reasons, to either Francophones or Anglophones. The struggle by French-speaking Canadians outside of Quebec to obtain their own schools is wasting the energies of Franco-Manitobans, for example. Although the minority language education right is guaranteed them in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, they are being forced to the courts in order to have that right acknowledged.

If there is to be real equality between the two official languages of Canada, as is envisaged in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the federal and all of the provincial governments must fully support the learning of French as a second language by the majority of Canadians outside of Quebec. The result of limiting provinces' and the federal government's obligations merely to maintaining the status quo in this area could well mean no progress on second language learning from this point onward—no new French immersion programs, no improved core or basic French programs, and no end to parental struggles for better French second language opportunities for our children. This might well hinder the further development of harmonious relations between Canadians because of an inability on the part of many citizens to participate fully in national life due to the lack of second language skills. Canada is noted worldwide for having achieved a high degree of linguistic peace and harmony between two founding cultures and languages, and anything that puts that in jeopardy is to be deplored.

The position outlined in the Langevin text seems to be in conflict with the new Official Languages Bill tabled on June 25, 1987, in which the federal government undertook to continue to work with the provinces on the official languages in education through a renewal of the bilateral agreements, to support all Canadians in their efforts to learn both official languages, and to work with labour, business and the voluntary sector to promote the official languages of Canada. Those are certainly excellent objectives.

There is, however, a strange inconsistency here. All parties to the Constitutional Accord undertook to preserve the linguistic character of Canada. In the new Official Languages Bill the national government undertook to actively promote the official languages for all Canadians. Unfortunately, the majority of anglophone provinces have yet to make any matching undertakings to promote the official languages in their jurisdictions, and their uneven record of commitment to the official languages to date is cause for great concern.

If provincial and national governments do not unite in their efforts to actively promote second language learning, then their undertakings in support of minority language Canadians will be non-effective. It is sad, but true, that minority language young people often prefer to speak the majority language on social occasions, assuring the onward march of assimilation. It is CPF's hope that through good French second language programs we will make the everyday use of French or English acceptable and possible in all parts of our country and therefore perhaps slow the assimilation rate.

All Canadians should have access to the two official languages. To achieve that objective all provincial governments must promote their official minority language, especially in education. Within that specifically provincial domain—education—the learning of a second official language offers exciting challenges and great opportunities for our young people. We acknowledge the progress which the provinces have already made in official languages. However, much more needs to be accomplished.

The limitation of the constitutional obligations on the anglophone provinces to do no more than preserve the linguistic character of Canada, while recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, could eventually result in a linguistic curtain being drawn around Quebec, creating not a distinct society but a "ghetto" ripe for the fostering of events that might again lead toward separatism. Lack of emphasis on French for all Canadians outside of Quebec, including large francophone communities in New Brunswick, Manitoba and Ontario, could throw Quebecers even more upon their own resources, and those of other francophone countries, for cultural diversity and renewal, thereby increasing their isolation and the possibilities for separatism. Emphasis on the promotion of French outside of Quebec, on the other hand, would likely result in a greater outreach to Quebec by other Canadians, francophone and non-francophone, asking her to share with them her rich cultural heritage. This would prevent the development of isolationism.

We are also concerned about the amendment relating to those cost-sharing programs exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. It is not clear to us whether or not a province could opt out of the federal-provincial bilateral agreement for the funding of official languages in education. The present agreements end in 1988.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt. I was engaged in another aspect of this matter. Could the witness please tell me which page of her brief she is now dealing with?

Dr. Purdy: I am on page 6, about halfway down. To continue, could an "opting-out" province be compensated if it wished to offer a second, or even a first, language education program which was, in the opinion of that province, "compatible with national objectives"? Who is to determine what standards would be acceptable?

In fact, the present Official Languages in Education Program has been, and is, a great incentive to provinces to offer French education. The program, begun in 1970-71, has recently been ably and positively evaluated by Dr. Stacy Churchill. He recommends a continuation of the federal-provincial agreements, with more funding to be supplied by the federal government, both to make up for a cut in funding in 1979 and to enable first and official second language programs to continue and expand. Recent information has indicated to us that, rather than increasing funding, the government anticipates a $6.3 million cut in this area in the next fiscal year.

To make a further point: CPF believes that majority language speakers who have learned French have contributed considerably to the turn-around in public opinion in support of minority language rights. We take this opportunity to draw your attention to the results of a Canadian facts survey commissioned by the Commissioner of Official Languages in 1985. Eighty-six per cent of respondents thought it would be a good thing if all Canadians could speak both French and English; 73 per cent thought that the teaching of both languages in school should be compulsory, out of that number 76 per cent of those under 25 years of age supported the proposition.

In response to questions about service in the minority language, 85 per cent of respondents under 25 supported such services being offered by the federal government, while 74 per cent of the total sample were in support; 69 per cent of respondents under 25 supported such services being offered by provincial governments, while 57 per cent of the total sample were in support. We are proud to see young people leading the way to changing attitudes on the official languages in education and in government services. Clearly they accept the notion of two equal languages. Can you, as leaders of Canada, be less generous?

Finally, we are concerned that minority language rights were not singled out in the Constitutional Accord along with multicultural and aboriginal rights. Multicultural and aboriginal rights are of great importance, but we wonder whether this amendment was inserted into the text without sufficient thought to the legal implications of not specifically referring to other Charter rights. Was this omission of minority language rights simply the result of haste, or has the present government plans to change official bilingualism in Canada?

● (1700)

We conclude our brief on an optimistic note. CPF's dream is that all Canadian young people shall have the opportunity to become bilingual in French and English if they wish to do so, or acquire as much fluency in the other official language as they wish. We work to see that this dream becomes a right. We look forward to the day when Canada's two "official" languages will be within the grasp of all young Canadians, not an opportunity granted to some but not to others at the whim of school boards and dependent upon endless arguments about costs. To give young people a good knowledge of both official languages is a sound investment in their future and in the future of Canada. We trust that short-term economic and political considerations will not outweigh the value of such a long-term economic and personal benefit to us all.

Canada's strength is that it is a united country, in spite of almost insurmountable odds. This strength is demonstrated, we believe, by the enormous pride Canadians feel when they travel abroad. We suspect that many Canadians will never forgive a government which rushes them off in a direction in which they may not wish to go. What need is there to hurry? We urge patient negotiation to achieve a constitutional amendment which truly represents the Canadian ethic, as opposed to the Ontario ethic, the Quebec ethic or even the Alberta ethic. Language rights must not depend on the province of residence or on the will of provincial governments; language rights must be equal for all Canadians. At the beginning of this paper is a summary of the points.

The Chairman: Thank you, Dr. Purdy. The first questioner on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Stewart.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Chairman, I thank the witnesses for an excellent brief. It is extremely helpful. I must say that the statistical material at the end of the brief will be very helpful as well.

I would like to deal specifically with your view that the effect of this agreement will be to freeze the status quo in terms of what provinces, other than Quebec, will do with regard to English language training. You may not have used the words "freeze the status quo," but let me complete my question. By the way, did you hear the presentation of the witnesses who preceded you?

Dr. Purdy: Partially.

Senator Marsden: One of the issues they raised was the contention inside Quebec that "social peace" on language issues was a priority and that social peace could be achieved through the kind of legislation contained in the Meech Lake Accord. The statistics you present show, for example, that in my province of Ontario there is a fairly rapid rate of assimilation. If I am interpreting your figures correctly, the assimilation of people with French as their mother tongue is 28.4 per cent, much higher than the assimilation of Anglophones into French. So we see that the situation is that of a real minority. However, is there not another problem which has to do with access, and which I think you are trying to get at here, namely, that it is much easier for young people to learn the other language if you have a lot of money to send your children to a private school, or that you, somehow or other, can make this training a feature of what we might call economic privilege rather than a right for all citizens? Would you care to comment on that aspect of what might happen if the accord goes through?

Dr. Purdy: In dealing with this accord you must rely on assumption to some extent, because the document is not exactly clear as to what is meant. This point that the document requires a lot of interpretation has probably been raised before. I would say that if the status quo is maintained we are probably not in an urgent position as far as the possibility of the program becoming an elitist one is concerned. We have worked very hard over the past ten years to ensure that language learning is not an elitist situation. Learning a language has been shown not to depend on IQ or on anything else. You could argue that it depends on money, because if you can afford to purchase the opportunity to go to a French-speaking area it is easier to acquire the skill and knowledge.

I think we are dealing with an attitudinal problem. Probably everyone would agree that not everyone in Canada accepts the idea of official languages with the degree of openness we might wish. So you run into the problem in more remote areas, where they do not see the absolute urgency of learning French, in a particular town at a particular time, and the children are denied privileges or opportunities to learn a second language. If the authority is given into the hands of provincial governments, and there is no pressure put on them to promote minority languages, the obligation will be lost. It is like removing the guy behind the curtain who is prompting in a show. There would be nobody there to keep feeding the idea that it is necessary to have two languages. Two languages is an ideal, and perhaps we should not stop at two. Let us have three or four languages. I think it makes sense for Canadians to learn French and English, but it does not mean that you should stop at learning French and English. If you have an opportunity to learn German, Italian or Japanese, then, by all means, you should take advantage of it.

We see in this accord the closing in of attitudes which do not allow a broader interpretation, that people will come to the point where, since they are under no obligation to provide these opportunities, and since it costs so much money, they will suggest that they do without it. Your question is a difficult one to answer, because I do not know the opinion of this government as far as these bilateral agreements on education are concerned. They are negotiating now, but they are very closed-mouth about what is going on. So I have no idea of whether, in fact, they have subtracted the $6.3 million. Our information is that, yes, they have, that the base line started at $6.3 million less than what the provinces enjoyed in the last fiscal year.

Senator Marsden: In the beginning of your presentation you describe your association. How many of your members are in Quebec and francophone?

Dr. Purdy: It is impossible for me to tell you how many members are francophone. Our membership in Quebec is not great. I would imagine that we have between 200 and 300 members in Quebec. Most of them are English-speaking. Our francophone membership is impossible to identify, because the children of members within provinces that do not have first language French schools, which in many cases are communities, are put in immersion programs. So they lose their franco-phone identity, as far as we are concerned.

We really do not want to know the numbers, because that is not what we are about. We do not wish to create Francophones and Anglophones. We wish to work at increasing the group in the middle that understands the good parts of both cultures and both languages and makes use of them. We wish to see the cultures grow in the country, to make it a special country with the ability to go two ways. I do not know whether I have answered your question.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, my question relates to what you say, on page 6, about shared-cost programs. I am looking for clarification. On page 6 of your brief, you say:

• (1710)

It is not clear to us whether or not a province could opt out of the federal/provincial bilateral agreement for the funding of official languages in education. The present agreements end in 1988. Could an "opting out" province be compensated if it wished to offer a second (or even first) language education program which was, in the opinion of that province, "compatible with national objectives"? Who is to determine what standards would be acceptable?

Would you amplify for us what you are saying there, and then I may have another question?

Dr. Purdy: It is not as clear as it should be. When I read that over I wondered why I had not re-written it. However, I have not done so, so I will try to explain.

I think the way in which the present bilateral agreements work is that the federal government transfers to the provinces certain moneys, as agreed upon either on a per capita basis or by agreement on a negotiated basis, and these moneys are for the promotion of the first and second languages within that province. Our concern is: Who is to set the standard for that? Will any division be established between what money goes to first-language groups and what money goes to second-language groups? At the moment, I think, it is clear that the second-language groups do get a portion of this money.

However, if you cut the pie smaller and smaller, will you, in fact, ease out the second-language funding, because, if you do that, then all of the children in Canada who are learning through a French immersion program or through a core French program will be cut out of funding. In provinces such as my home province of New Brunswick, for example, it would be disastrous to have that amount of money pulled out of the educational system, because, whether the province admits it or not, they have built their educational system—which is a dual system for both French and English—on the fact that that money is coming from Ottawa and that it is tagged for language education.

I believe that according to our Constitution the federal government has no business in the realm of education. However, the present system was a method devised by the previous government to encourage the provinces to increase the amount of second-language instruction in order to, in fact, spread the idea of bilingualism. Since education is not a realm over which the federal government has control, the transfer of this money is not, strictly speaking, legitimate, but it is specifically earmarked for the teaching of language. Therefore, if these agreements continue to be cut back, then, of course, the support for more language training in schools will evaporate.

I think we saw the beginning of the movement away from language training when the universities dropped French as an entrance requirement. This happened quite some time ago. There is now a movement, and I hope it is beginning to gain some momentum, that, in fact, if French is not an entrance requirement, it should be an exit requirement for Canadian universities.

The point is that if the federal government withdraws the funding which it has, until now, contributed towards this program, whether you call it a transfer of funds for education or for official language training, the whole system will fall apart as far as second-language training is concerned. The system is very fragile, because it is very new. It is not much more than ten years old, and is just like a ten-year old child. If you remove all of the support systems that are available to them, they will flounder, and that will certainly be the case as far as second-language training in Canada is concerned.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The proposed new section 106(a) of the Constitution provides for compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section. You say that the present agreements with regard to education in the official languages will end in 1988. Is it your view that a new agreement made in 1988 in this matter would be a national shared-cost program established after the coming into force of this section? In other words, would this section apply at all to a program for official languages?

Dr. Purdy: Senator, I am not a constitutional lawyer. I really cannot answer that question. In fact, I am asking you the question as to whether it is open to interpretation, that these agreements that are now in place between the provinces and the federal government will be in jeopardy by virtue of this clause. In other words, is this one of the things that are under scrutiny? Is it something that the federal government can now say that it intends to withdraw, or can a province say, "We do not see French as a priority in province X, but we are going to institute a core program across the province and it will cost X-number of dollars." In our view, this is a fine program, but that is not the intent behind the original transfer of those federal funds.

Therefore, senator, it is impossible for me to answer your question, because I really do not have the interpretation. I think what is lacking is the fact that it does not say clearly whether or not this type of agreement will be affected.

[Dr. Purdy.]

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have one other question. It is a rather complicated question, and if you want to say that it comes to you out of the blue, and you want to think it over and not answer it now, we will all understand.

Some time ago, I believe it was in 1984, the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia, the Honourable Terrence Donahoe, told a committee of the Senate that insofar as education is concerned there are national objectives, but that these national objectives are defined by the governments to which, under the Constitution, education is assigned as a legislative matter. In other words, we must go to the ten provincial governments and accumulate their views, and the result of that accumulation is what is meant by "the national objectives" in the field of education.

That view, which is an authoritative view, coming as it does from a distinguished lawyer, the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia, could be fitted in with the last words of the proposed new section 106A:

... compatible with the national objectives.

And, as Mr. Donahoe would say, as defined by the appropriate governments, the provincial governments.

My problem is that that interpretation of the concluding words of the proposed new section does not seem to run easily with the expression used earlier, where the section says that there is to be compensation where a province chooses not to participate "in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada." That seems to imply that the objectives of that program are determined by the Government of Canada. Therefore, in one place, we seem to be talking about a program in which the Government of Canada—I assume it means the Parliament of Canada—defines what is "national" whereas, later on, there is room for an interpretation which puts the definition of "objectives" entirely with the provincial legislatures and provincial governments.

Dr. Purdy, are you aware of this problem? If not, and if it comes to you as a new matter, I will not press you for an answer.

Dr. Purdy: I think we are aware of it, because we work with it all the time. However, when it comes to being able to answer you, I really feel that perhaps it is beyond our ability to give you a learned answer.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, you are saying that this is a matter that would have to be decided by the judges?

Dr. Purdy: I would hate to think that we would, in fact, turn this over to the courts. I think the people should decide what they want. I have difficulty with the thought of having ten ministers of education at any given time sitting down and determining the national standards that we should work towards.

When you look at the backgrounds, from time to time, of some of the ministers of education, you wonder what qualities they have that qualified them for that job. That is perhaps a very hard-line position, but for those people alone to set the national standards for the whole of the country would be a mistake. There has to be some better leadership than that. There should be some aspirations to a higher level than what ten men can come up with in a room on a given day.

Although I realize that education is strictly a provincial responsibility, it is also one of the biggest headaches we have in this country. Every province has a different idea of the direction it wants to take, and when children move from one province to another—which they do with ever-increasing frequency—they find that they are not in grade three any more, they are in grade four, or vice versa. So, the portability of the whole system is almost to the point of being unworkable.

It would be nice if that group of people could come to an agreement, but I could see all kinds of agendas that would be hidden under the table and trade-offs that would be made. Certainly in the area of language, which is what our organization concentrates on, this would not inspire any confidence whatsoever.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): I have listened with great interest to your brief. Some parts of it are very perceptive, which is not being paternalistic. I think that is a measure of the progress we have achieved in this country, in spite of some temporary moments of depression.

For example, at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3, you say:

In the majority of the anglophone provinces there are insufficient schools in which young francophones can receive education in their own language. In some communities this results in a necessity to share a school with anglophones—a situation generally unacceptable, for pedagogical reasons, to either francophones or anglophones.

Fifteen years ago that point of view was quite fundamental to the differences between former Mayor Jones in Moncton and myself. Mayor Jones advocated that his children and my children should be educated in the same school and play in the same schoolyard. That sort of situation is good in what I would call a Rotary Club Fraternity, but in education—and I have some pretensions here, because I am a former teacher—that is a sure way to ensure the assimilation by la force des choses because of the overwhelming pressure of a society in which minority language groups live.

This view should be publicized, because it is still somewhat misunderstood in many regions of Canada. If you want your children taught in their own language, some people think you are trying to ostracize other members of society, which of course is not a fact at all. When we look at the social contacts between young people, we know that they overcome the problems of separate schoolyards in their own ways.

If I understand your brief, you are saying that the federal government should not disengage itself but, on the contrary, it should continue to promote and encourage the use of two languages by as many Canadians as possible.

I have two questions that I would like to ask you. The funds which the provinces contribute as their share of an agreement with the federal government tend to get used for other purposes. If you look at the statistics of the federal contribution for universities, even in very wealthy provinces, those contributions are over 50 per cent. Have the funds allocated to the two-language system—that is, teaching French to English-speaking students, or the contrary in Quebec—been used for that purpose?

My other question is this: Is your fear that the Meech Lake Accord will create a situation where Quebec is given a special status, that is, being a distinct society and preserving French culture? That is one interpretation that I have heard. If that is the case, then other jurisdictions will tend to say that if it involves French it is none of New Brunswick's, Nova Scotia's or Saskatchewan's business, it is Quebec's business, and therefore that will create what you call in your brief a linguistic curtain around Quebec. I would like to hear your views on those two points.

Mrs. Kathryn Manzer, Former National Vice-President, Canadian Parents for French: Your first question, if I understood it, is: Do we believe that money that is intended for teaching French to English-speaking children and English to French-speaking children is actually being directed to the cause for which it is intended?

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Yes.

Mrs. Manzer: The short answer is no. The longer answer is that our organization would believe that that situation has improved considerably. In a large part, because of the support we feel we have had from the federal government, bilingualism has been a front and centre issue, and this makes it much easier for us to deal with our provincial governments and, even more particularly, with our school boards. We can point to the fact that this is a matter of federal importance, and it helps us to ensure that the federal money that comes to the provinces and the provincial money that goes to the individual boards is, in fact, spent in the way in which it is intended to be spent.

Dr. Purdy: I would like to answer your second question regarding the linguistic curtain. I hesitate to take upon myself any responsibility for speaking on behalf of Francophones—and I am not trying to do that—but I think that Francophones outside Quebec view themselves differently than do Quebecers. Coming from the province of New Brunswick, and not being a native of New Brunswick, perhaps has given me a certain perspective that I can look at both sides more objectively; maybe not.

To say that Quebec is a distinct society does, in fact, convey to it a certain leadership role, which perhaps it should have. However, it also eliminates any leadership which the other francophone communities in this country have. The Acadians are a very large group. This agreement dismisses them as being a non-entity and that they are not to be considered. As you move across the country, and as our CPF group works with their counterparts in the francophone communities, we find that the personalities of the Francophones across this country vary as much as do the personalities of the Anglophones. There is as much divergence in their opinions as there is in our opinions.

I heard Senator LeBlanc speaking earlier about the French arriving in our part of the world in 1603. If you want to erase all that, and say that nothing happened in Canada until 1608 in Quebec, that is fine, but that is ignoring the facts. The fact is that there are French communities right across this country, and that the French were part of the founding of this country. I think we have officially accorded them some rights in this country; we have made them equal partners, but that has not been translated all the way through the system. I think there is still a great resistance to the fact that they are equal. I think that by teaching children two languages and two cultures at the same time one does a great deal to eliminate the prejudice that has been built up over the years in various parts of this country.

My children started in immersion classes in grade one, and they object to anyone who makes any disparaging remarks about Francophones, because they feel that those disparaging remarks are aimed at them, because they also speak French. Being fully bilingual has changed their outlook entirely. They live in a very anglophone community, but I would challenge any of my friends who would come into our home and make any disparaging remarks about Francophones. I will not be the one who jumps on them, it will be my two children, with arguments that are non-refutable. They understand both sides.

Granted, they are not Francophones; they are Anglophones, but they can see the other side of the question. I think the same is true of Francophones who have learned to speak English and who have lived in an English society. They are basically what they were born into, but they can still understand what the other group is doing. That is what we are advocating as a group.

We are still a minority in this country, but we are a fast-growing minority. Over the past ten years our membership has shot up to levels no one could have predicted. No one could have predicted the popularity of French programs in this country, or even have forced educators to look at the old core French programs, where everyone read the newspaper, but could not utter a word of French. If they had had to order their breakfast in French, they would all have starved. Those educators have now decided that that program needs to be revamped. Many of us could have told them that a long time ago, when we were trying to learn, by rote, or whatever, and did not have any role models to stand in front of us who could speak the language.

The ability to change is absolutely remarkable. We have a dream, and we are just hanging on to it. Anything we do to lessen that grip will, in fact, destroy that dream and it will slip away, because it is a very tenuous one.

I think this also goes back to the fact that not one community can be given the sole responsibility for the maintenance of that dream. That responsibility must be spread over the entire Canadian population, and Quebec has no right to be the only designated group to in fact promote the French language and the French culture.

[Dr. Purdy.]

Perhaps some of those views are my own; I should not attribute all of what I have said to the CPF, but generally we are in agreement.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc. I now call upon Senator Bielish.

Senator Bielish: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the presentation with great interest. It brought me back to 1962, when the first Canadian Conference on Education was held. At that time I became thoroughly aware of both languages, since the 1962 Canadian Conference on Education was totally bilingual.

May I just defend my own province? In 1936 Alberta, a province that now has a bad name—just for the moment; I am sure it will recover—had several schools that were bilingual. If a child started out in French, that child was taught English, and if a child started out in English, that child was taught French. Those were their language courses. Those children then graduated to high school and went through high school in the same way. There was an ample number of French immersion programs.

You say in your brief that in all the provinces there are 17,000 active individuals in your organization. Are those individuals parents?

Dr. Purdy: The majority would be, but we do not say that if someone is not a parent he cannot join. Some of those people would be educators, but the vast majority of our membership is made up of parents.

Senator Bielish: When you say “in all provinces and both territories,” what are the percentages?

Dr. Purdy: I do not have the figures in front of me, but I can tell you from the greatest to the least. The largest membership is in British Columbia, followed by Ontario, then Alberta, then Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan—perhaps Manitoba is a little ahead of some of the others.

Senator Bielish: What is the province or territory with the largest percentage?

Dr. Purdy: British Columbia.

Senator Bielish: What is the percentage?

Dr. Purdy: It changes all the time, but it is approximately 20 per cent.

Senator Bielish: Is that 20 per cent of the national figure?

Dr. Purdy: It changes all the time.

Senator Bielish: And what province or territory has the lowest percentage?

Dr. Purdy: The territories, of course, would have the lowest in numbers, but behind the territories definitely the province of Quebec.

Senator Bielish: Could you tell us why the lowest is in Quebec?

Dr. Purdy: Because Quebec is a different situation. That is a system that is difficult to understand. I am not sure I can outline that to you quickly, but many Anglophones in Quebec, we have found by doing a study of the situation, have, in fact, decided that French is so important to their child's education that they have opted not to put them in English schools with second-language programs but have put them in French first-language schools to ensure they have a good French education so that they can compete economically and socially in Quebec.

These parents tend to leave their children in the French schools to the end of the elementary grades, then they pull them out and put them in English high schools. That is the general pattern.

I suppose they do not see the activities of CPF to be too relevant, because we advocate second-language programs. They do not need second-language programs, because they have immersed their children in the first language.

Mrs. Manzer: There have been opportunities available for their children that have not been available to parents in other parts of Canada, and they have not had that same impetus to become involved so that their children can learn.

Dr. Purdy: I think they are beginning to see now that their English-language schools are being threatened simply from numbers, because they have taken all of the children out of the early grades and do not have viable early grades. So, their whole school system is threatened in some cases. I think they have been looking more favourably over the past few years at introducing good second-language programs within the English system so that, in fact, parents do not feel the necessity of putting their children in French first-language programs.

I think Quebec is a province that needs immersion as much as any of the other provinces. There is a real need for that, and it keeps the children within their own linguistic group.

There is no sense in joining a group that is advocating something you already have.

Senator Bielish: If that is true for Quebec, then why are we complaining about some areas where there is no apparent need for the French language?

● (1740)

Dr. Purdy: What you are saying is not quite true, because there is a need, but it is being answered by the first-language community. The first-language community is, in fact, viable. The second-language community is dumping their children in the first-language schools, so that is answering their need, but that is not true in the other provinces. In fact, no matter what you say, it is not a good situation to dump language groups together, because you will assimilate one or the other. In this country it is always the Francophones who are being assimilated. As soon as you introduce English, the language in the school halls, et cetera, deteriorates to English, because that is where the impetus is coming from south of the border. All the songs they hear, all the movies they watch—everything they hear is in English. It is only recently that there have been French offerings that will compete with this type of blasting from south of the border.

I do not know whether that answers your question, though.

Senator Bielish: I do not know that it does either, but that is probably beside the point.

I simply want to congratulate your organization, Canadian Parents for French, on your objectives. Back in 1962 those objectives existed also. In the Canadian Conference on Education each committee had either a French chairman and an anglophone co-chairman or vice versa. I kept records from that. To me, that was an education. We went across the nation at that time to prepare for that national conference.

Dr. Purdy: I agree with what you are saying, but we are saying that it should not be limited to an elite group that can afford to make themselves bilingual; it should be something that is available to all children.

What is happening is that there is an elite in this country developing that have two languages, which is fine if that is the way you want to go, but we feel that all children should have the opportunity to acquire the second language when they start school, if they so desire.

Senator Bielish: I agree that two languages would be wonderful, and three would be even better. In some of our prairie provinces other languages are taught. For instance, the demand for German is there, and it is taught—probably at private schools. The provincial governments are in charge of education up until Grade XII in our schools. So they are responsible for the cost of education, the handling of the education. Wherever there is a large enough group that wants a certain language, and a qualified teacher is available, it is given to them for as long as that group finds the need for that language.

The group of witnesses who were in the seat before you said that they have to pay for their first language—they have to carry the costs of being schooled in their first language. I have some concerns, because things are so different across the country.

I do not know if I can say anything that will enlighten me about what you are trying to do, except—to go back to my first question—I would like to know how extensive this is and how much success you are having in it. How has the growth come?

Mrs. Manzer: How successful have we been in our objectives?

Senator Bielish: Yes.

Mrs. Manzer: I think that we have been successful indeed. Dr. Purdy has talked about most of the examples, such as the tremendous growth in immersion, which is fairly obvious. There are now approximately 200,000 children in Canada in immersion programs. In Ontario I cannot give you the national statistic, but there are over 800,000 children in core French programs. This is an enormous change as well. This is no longer the sort of Mickey Mouse French that most of us learned. The children who are coming out of core French programs are also able to communicate in French.

More important than those statistics is the change in atmosphere that we can all see in the last ten years. All across Canada there are so many more opportunities to use French and a great deal more mutual respect for the two languages, which Dr. Purdy touched on earlier. I for one do not feel as if I have wasted the last ten years of my life, and I do not think that many of us do.

Another encouraging thing for all of us in Canadian Parents for French is the support, cooperation and friendship that we have with the francophone organizations—our sort of corresponding organizations across the country—both nationally, provincially and locally as well; sponsoring things together, working together and supporting each other's objectives.

Senator Bielish: When I look back to 1936 and the harmony that existed in the school systems there, there was no problem.

Mrs. Manzer: That is right.

Senator Bielish: You started with sign language, and pretty soon you were speaking the language.

Mrs. Manzer: I think that you were a microcosm, and perhaps we are more than that. What you had was good, but when it is multiplied by 10,000 it is even better.

Senator Bielish: I have no doubt. I wish that I could be thoroughly conversant.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Bielish. I have two quick questions of my own.

As a Franco-Manitoban, I have a particular interest in the brief that you presented to us today. Will you be presenting briefs to those provinces that have hearings of their own? Ontario has started hearings now, and I believe that my own province of Manitoba will be holding hearings.

Dr. Purdy: We are divided into provincial chapters. You are hearing from the national body today, but each provincial chapter will, in fact, address the hearings when they are open to them. I think that you will hear from our counterparts at the provincial level.

The Chairman: Towards the end of page 8, you say, "What need is there to hurry?" Do I gather from you, then, that you feel that the accord is sufficiently flawed that we should not proceed with it, even though it is repeatedly said that any change in the accord or any delay will stop it?

Dr. Purdy: It is not the intention of the Canadian Parents for French to derail this agreement, but I wonder at signing an agreement simply because it is an agreement. To me, the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons held hearings this summer, and a great many Canadians gave up things they were doing during the summer—our best time of the year—to come to Ottawa to present their concerns and to outline the things that, to them, were not acceptable in this agreement. To be told at the end of the hearings that all of this activity was in vain does not augur well for the future.

Senator Frith: You were told at the beginning of the hearings that it was all in vain, because nothing could be changed.

Dr. Purdy: Well, I go to the end, because I always think there is possibly a chance of arguing and convincing someone that they could, in fact, change their position slightly without jeopardizing something.

I think amendments to this agreement could be made to remove a great deal of the concerns that a lot of Canadians have.

Personally, I worry at the process in which 11 people can be locked up in a room and come up with an answer for the whole country. I would have hoped that Canadians were more open. Granted, we like to discuss things until they are discussed to death, but we usually find a compromise solution that is agreeable to everyone. I do not have this feeling about this accord.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Purdy.

I must end the committee hearings, because we are approaching six o'clock.

Dr. Purdy and Mrs. Manzer, thank you very much for coming to share your views with us today and for the work that you put into the preparation of this brief. We greatly appreciate it.

Dr. Purdy: Thank you very much.

Mrs. Manzer: Thank you.

• (1750)

The Chairman: Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, February 10, 1988.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 4, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HON. DAVID J. WALKER, P.C.
HON. RHÉAL BÉLISLE
HON. ORVILLE H. PHILLIPS

FELICITATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SUMMONS TO THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I want to take this moment of your time to draw your attention to very happy anniversaries that are taking place this week. It is 25 years this week since three of our colleagues were summoned to the Senate on the advice of Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

Prior to his summons, the Honourable David Walker had had a distinguished legal career in the province of Ontario, he was a member of the House of Commons from 1957 to 1962 and was a minister of the Crown. He was summoned to the Senate 25 years ago today, February 4, 1963.

[Translation]

The Hon. Rhéal Bélisle was an M.P.P. in Ontario from 1955 until he was called to the Senate on February 4, 1963.

Senator Bélisle was decorated three times by the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, by the Order of Saint Gregory the Great and by the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem. When he is in the Chair in the Senate and in Committee of the Whole, he always presides with great distinction. I wish to congratulate him on this happy occasion.

[English]

The Honourable Orville Phillips—who is currently our Chief Government Whip and chairman of the government caucus—was also a member of the House of Commons from 1957 to 1963. He is a veteran of the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II, and a member of the dental profession in his province of Prince Edward Island. While he is absent on parliamentary business today, I take this occasion to extend to him, to Senator Bélisle and, of course, to Senator Walker our gratitude for the years of service they have contributed to Canada through this place, and our best wishes for continued health and happiness and satisfaction in their work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I gladly second the words of congratulation extended to our colleagues by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Some men and women are lucky, and these particular appointments were particularly fortuitous, because, had the appointments been delayed a month or two or three, it is unlikely that they would ever have had 25 years of service in the Senate of Canada, because, as the Leader of the Government pointed out, the appointments were made just before the demise of the Diefenbaker government and, of course, the formation of a new Liberal government, under the leadership of the late Mr. Pearson, which was sworn in on April 22, 1963.

Senator Frith: And, Senator Murray, you have no right of reply!

Senator MacEachen: I must say that I had the good fortune of serving in the House of Commons with Senators Walker and Phillips prior to their summons to the Senate. I remember quite vividly their activities in the House of Commons.

I must say that while both of them are still quite feisty they have mellowed considerably since those more turbulent days in the House of Commons. I regret that I have not any previous experience with Senator Bélisle in another legislative body, but I must say that he has been an excellent colleague. It is always a pleasure not to have to assist him in his solitary walk when he takes the Chair in the Senate.

I want to say that I associate myself and my colleagues with these words of congratulations. Some of us will never see a twenty-fifth anniversary in the Senate—and that is certainly all right with me!

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, on my twenty-fifth anniversary may I be permitted to make the “longest” speech in my life? To the Leader of the Government in the Senate and to the Leader of the Opposition may I say that their kindness and friendship will assist me to stay here at least another 25 years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: Right on!

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-60, to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not quite clear when this bill should be read a second time. I know that Senator Doyle has had discussions—not negotiations, just discussions—with a view to having second reading this afternoon. I know that he is prepared and ready to go, but if there are reasons that that should not be, then there will be no great upset on this side of the house.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doyle has spoken to me about it and has a good reason to want to speak to it today. He would normally speak to it on Tuesday next, if we gave the normal adjournment, but on Tuesday next he is hoping to be at the meeting in Edmonton of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill C-55. If we take the same break as the House of Commons is taking, or commence a break at the same time, he would not have an opportunity to speak to it for two or three weeks. I have asked him to try to contact Senator Grafstein, our spokesman on the bill, to see if Senator Grafstein has any objection to Senator Doyle's proceeding today. Senator Grafstein could then use Senate Debates as a basis for his response to the government spokesman.

I think we should stand this order until later this day, and then call it when Senator Doyle has had a chance to speak to Senator Grafstein.

Senator Doody: Could we stand this item for a decision later this day?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MEECH LAKE CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS TO SERVE ON SUBMISSIONS GROUP

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That the following Senators be appointed to serve on the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, namely, the Honourable Senators Cools, Le Moyne, Lucier, Marchand and Molgat.

I believe there must be a companion motion about representatives of supporters of the government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are three volunteers on this side whom I would like now to initiate into the new committee. They are Senator Macquarrie, who is not here at present, Senator Bielish and Senator Tremblay.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Frith: With leave, I move that those names be added to the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

That the following Senators be appointed to serve on the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, namely, the Honourable Senators Bielish, Cools, Le Moyne, Lucier, Macquarrie, Marchand, Molgat, and Tremblay.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the usual motion for adjournment. I should mention that we have Royal Assent planned for later this afternoon, at about 4.45 p.m.; and we would be pleased to have as many of our colleagues as possible attend.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 9th February, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ABORTION

JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government is proposing any action following the Supreme Court judgment of last week? I know that the Minister of Justice mentioned in the House of Commons that the government would take its responsibilities. I wonder, in the interim, whether the government has had a chance to consider the matter and whether it plans any reaction, including legislative proposals?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there is no plan to legislate at the moment. We are consulting very closely with the provinces on this matter. The Minister of Justice has written to his provincial counterparts and a federal-provincial meeting will be held shortly at the official level. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has also been in touch with his provincial counterparts, as has the Minister of State for the Status of Women.

The honourable senator will be aware, of course, that as a result of the Supreme Court decision of last week there is created what might be called a legal vacuum on this matter. It is our position that this is a matter that must be addressed jointly by the federal and provincial governments. How that vacuum should be filled and by what order of government is a matter for consultation between the federal government and the provinces.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1987-88

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-108, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I am not going to take a lot of time to explain what is missing in this bill, but I am sure that all honourable senators, particularly two or three senators opposite, would be disappointed—in fact, I think they would think I had failed—if I did not make some comment about the subject matter of Bill C-108, if only because I have been raising questions on some aspects of it for almost two years now. I am sure that the Leader of the Government would want me to acknowledge some improvements in Bill C-108, as the Special Canadian Grains Program applies to the 1987-88 crop year. I might even want to argue that some of the questions I put and representations I made over the past 18 months may have influenced the government in making those modifications to the program for this year. I see several senators opposite nodding agreement to that. If that is true, then I am happy I did that.

I know that Senator Barootes spent a lot of time seeking information from various departments, or at least two departments, of the government. I want him to know that I appreciate his efforts. Indeed, I appreciate the interpretation he placed, on a couple of occasions, on what was meant when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture said that something was “also important.” The most important interpretation—and this was the first time I heard it from any supporter of the government—was that the reasons for the Special Grains Program have given rise to an ongoing program of the government until those reasons have expired; that is, until the depressed international market for cereal grains, attributed to the subsidy war going on between the United States and the European Economic Community, is no longer depressed.

That interpretation gives some comfort to farmers in grain-growing areas in western Canada, because prospects of that subsidy war terminating soon are not very great. There are some minor hopeful signs that appear from time to time, but the reference that was sent to GATT to try to find an acceptable solution, as far as I can tell, has not borne a great deal of fruit to date. We can still hope that it will happen, but I would like to have an acknowledgement of the interpretation that Senator Barootes put on the Prime Minister's remarks at the time of his announcement of this program at the Agricultural Outlook Conference on December 17. Senator Barootes' interpretation was to the effect that it is a program that will remain in effect until the international price again rises to some reasonable level.

I think I should also say at the outset that, as honourable senators well know, there is more than one reason for making a speech on the floor of the Senate. One, of course, is to try to persuade your colleagues to adopt your point of view; another reason is that there are people who will read your speech afterwards in the Debates of the Senate. Also, with the advent of these new word-processing devices it is rather easy to assemble a mailing list and have your speech mailed. I see Senator Doody is acknowledging that he understands that purpose for making a speech. It all comes back to you the next day in both official languages, and it is one of the most efficient ways that I know of having a message developed and sending it out to those who are on your mailing list. There are several dozen—and sometimes several hundred—people in southern Alberta who like me to advise them of things that are going on that might be of interest to them.

However, honourable senators, there is yet another reason for making a speech on the floor of the Senate. When I was in government we made sure that there were some people in the department who read the House of Commons Debates and Debates of the Senate every day and very carefully took into account what the members of this house and of the other House had to say. Therefore, if you want people at the second, third and fourth level of government to know something—and they are very influential people—you make a speech on the floor, knowing that they will be reading it. In fact, it is probably more certain that they will read what is in the printed debates of both houses and probably be influenced as much or more by that than would the Leader of the Government in the Senate, although on several occasions I have received a favourable response from him too.

The reason I am bringing up this subject today is because the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows, Senator Barootes knows and I know, that I have raised this matter over and over again since early in 1987, when it was obvious that the price of wheat would be very low. I have persistently asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the government intended to continue this program for the 1987 crop year, and he was non-committal. In fact, the Prime Minister made the announcement in December. I understand that kind of strategy; I believe they call that a "photo-opportunity" when pictures are taken. However, I think it would have been better if the Prime Minister had clarified his announcement so that it was clear that, as per Senator Barootes' interpretation, what he was really announcing was an extension of the program and the funding that would go with it. I say that because there were a number of people in the grain-growing sector in my province who were in very difficult financial circumstances and who did not have that assurance until December, which was several months after they had already harvested their crop.

I suppose another reason is that there have been some changes. In many cases they are changes which I asked for not only for the 1987-88 crop but for the 1986-87 crop as well, particularly with regard to the formula for determining the payments to be applied to that crop. I want to thank the people who brought these matters to my attention. I know they read Hansard, and I want to send a message to them that I acknowledge the things they had to say and thank them for recommending to the government the modifications that show up in this year's program.

One of the most important changes is the addition of specialty crops and acreage under summer fallow. There is justification for including a significant portion of acreage that is under summer fallow, because it fits the usual land management practices followed, on the Prairies at least. Therefore, whether or not a farmer seeded a lot of acres in 1987 with grains that are eligible is really not so important. Otherwise, a farmer would lose out on a very large part of what he would otherwise be entitled to simply because he followed his usual rotation with regard to summer fallow, specialty crops, cereal grains, and so on. Therefore, it is important that specialty crops and summer fallow are included.

Furthermore, summer fallow and certain amounts of forage crops have been included in the quota books, because they are part of the rotation. Were they ineligible for quotas or for the Special Grains Program it would be a real injustice. It would have the effect of interfering with the good husbandry practices followed by these farmers. The farmer would be forced into seeding for the purpose of collecting the subsidy, and that is not what the program was intended to do. I am glad to see this change.

There is one thing that puzzles me in the report of the National Finance Committee on Supplementary Estimates (A) 1987-88, and it can be found on page 1913 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. It reads:

—the formula used to determine payments to producers takes into consideration only the estimated effects on individual commodity prices brought on by changes in the U.S. Farm Bill. No consideration is given to the specific actions of the European Economic Community. For example, if excess supplies in Europe of specialty crops such as mustard seed, safflower or lentils lead to dumping in the international market and result in falling incomes to Canadian farmers, no action under this program will be taken unless the United States takes prior remedial actions.

I understand that point insofar as setting the amounts that will be paid for these various specialty crops that have been included is concerned, but I think they missed the point completely in the past when they left out these crops, because the acreage was not even included in the formula for determining the amount to be paid to the farmer who has these crops in his rotation from time to time. As far as I am concerned, this is important and it is only just that it be added. I have complained in this chamber on behalf of people who grew mustard seed in 1986. Every acre they seeded in mustard seed instead of one of the cereal grains simply was not counted in calculating the payments made to them. That, in my opinion, was not fair. I am glad the government has made adjustments for the 1987 crop year so that mustard, lentils, dry peas, canary seeds, safflower, buckwheat, triticale and a number of other crops are included. It is not only the production in Europe or in the United States, or the actions taken in those markets to depress the prices, that is important, but also the fact that they can get that acreage calculated.

• (1430)

I also acknowledge that the government includes one-third of the summer fallow of 1987 to be used in calculating the payments, because that is the usual practice in some places. It is sometimes two-thirds crop and one-third summer fallow. But in southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta the usual ratio between summer fallow and seeded acreage is fifty-fifty.

If, in 1986, a farmer happened to have two-thirds of his land in summer fallow, he suffered a severe penalty compared to those farmers who had two-thirds of their land seeded.

Senator Barootes: Or continuous cropping.

Senator Olson: There would not be the same injustice in that case, because with continuous cropping a farmer would have had 100 per cent of the land seeded every year, and I understand that the government paid for that in both years.

Honourable senators, the situation has been improved to some extent. I am pleased to acknowledge that. I think the $1.1 billion allocated to this program—$800 million of which is contained in Bill C-108—represents significant funding. It is not enough to completely compensate for the loss. The increase from $1 billion last year to $1.1 billion this year, a 10 per cent increase, does not fully compensate for the reduction in the initial prices. Wheat is down 18 per cent in 1987 compared with 1986, and the initial price for barley, which is the floor price, is down by 27 per cent. So this amount does not fully make up the difference, but I acknowledge that, as a subsidy program, it represents a significant amount and is very helpful.

The announcement that was made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, at the Outlook Conference held last December, respecting farmers who are heavily in debt and who pay large amounts to service that debt sounded quite good. But after I attended a Senate Agriculture Committee meeting and was given a detailed explanation of how those funds were going to be used, by two officials from the Department of Agriculture, I have to say I am a little disappointed. I was led to believe that the farm debt review boards were going to be given some authority to at least make recommendations. We were told that. There was no ambiguity—they tried to avoid making recommendations. However, they did make recommendations which were more in the form of a conciliation suggestion to bring the creditor and debtor together. These debt review boards were not given authority to make decisions and impose those decisions for farmers' benefit.

I was under the impression that some funding was to be provided to help the farmers. This would not be a write-down but would be a reduction of the interest rate, which could be paid with that $40 million. During the committee meetings the officials informed us that 100 per cent of the $39.7 million will be used for operation and administration costs of those debt review boards. As far as I am concerned, that seems to be a lot of money to be used for that purpose. I was hoping there would be financial assistance provided to help the farmers.

I am not arguing or complaining that the government is being very specific in helping out some people. I happen to believe that this is a time to have specifically targeted assistance. Some people got into a debt problem because they made capital investments—particularly in land—at the peak of the inflationary period, 1979 to 1981. In some cases they are still paying the very high interest rates that were imposed at that time. For example, I know one farmer—and there are hundreds of farmers out there—who was paying 18 per cent to the Federal Business Development Bank until June of 1987. That is long after the rates had gone down. The FBDB said that the interest rate was to be left at that level until his loan was paid off. In my view, that is unfair. After a lot of hard work, we finally got them to bring it down to the level of current interest rates.

As I have said, there is a very wide range of severity or difficulty experienced by farmers in the same district, depending on when they bought certain capital assets. Land was the biggest purchase, but machinery comes into this equation to some extent.

I urge the government to be very sympathetic to some of those situations. No one has control over when they are born; no one has control over when they become 21 or 25 years of age, or when they enter the labour market, or when they begin farming. If someone happens to come of age and wants to enter the farming world, and it happens to be in an inflationary period when prices and interest rates are high, but, nevertheless, they decide to do it, then they are stuck with it. That is unfortunate. I think the government ought to be helpful in that situation.

Of course, we may have different philosophies. I happen to believe that the federal government's most important economic function is to help sectors that are in difficulty from time to time. There are other things they could do to promote industry, but the most important function of the federal government is to redistribute their resources and help an industry or a regional sector that is in difficulty. It happens in the fishing industry; it happens in the construction industry; it happens in the footwear industry and the textile industry. We have helped all of those sectors.

Senator Barootes: Petroleum!

Senator Olson: I can see Senator Barootes is getting primed up.

Although some may argue that nobody has to sign a note if he or she does not want to, I sincerely believe that not only young farmers but others who got into this severe debt—service charge difficulty—did so, in many cases, through no fault of their own. As I explained a few minutes ago, people in almost every part of Canada who bought land from about 1978 and 1979 up to 1981 are carrying a debt and a debt-service cost that is completely out of line with their revenue in 1987. Therefore, I believe the government ought to have specific targeting in trying to help some of those people out of that difficulty, and they should provide funds to do it.

The government did provide $30 million to the Farm Credit Corporation to rearrange some of those loans, but very little money—in fact, only about $7 million—was given to those farmers who were caught in that debt situation if they had borrowed the money from anyone other than the Farm Credit Corporation. There was no assistance at all. Quite frankly, I was led to believe that there would be some, but, after hearing the cross-examination which took place in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I know the money is not there.

Honourable senators, I wanted to draw those facts to your attention. I hope the government feels that part of my comments are an acknowledgement of some very positive, well-worthwhile steps that have been taken with respect to this matter. I hope they will take seriously the other suggestions I have made with respect to the debt problem and come in with a program which will give some relief in that respect.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, Senator Olson quoted from the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance currently being considered as if the quotation related to the findings of the committee this year. However, I would point out that what he quoted was stated in a previous report of the committee and was used as a quotation in the report now under discussion. I believe Senator Olson should have said that the committee reported that it was pleased with this action, because it appears to respond to the comments made by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in its report on the Supplementary Estimates (A) 1987-88.

I merely wanted to clear up that matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to acknowledge that what the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has said is true. It is a quotation contained in this report.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, we all listened carefully to the speech made by Senator Olson as he outlined many of the provisions of this deficiency payment and referred to some of the changes that have been made.

I just want to add that in dealing with this matter we should try to keep in mind the agricultural situation that in fact prevails out there, and particularly in western Canada. We are seeing a very large exodus of farmers from the land. We see numerous foreclosures going forward. We see communities losing some of their best citizens and their most efficient farmers. We are also seeing towns fold up. We are seeing businesses going bankrupt, being sold, and we are seeing a proliferation of ghost towns on the Prairies, because there is this tremendous exodus of farmers from the land.

The president of the Alberta Wheat Pool was quoted the other day as having said that in the next year he expected to see more than 15,000 farmers leave the farms. It is in that kind of context that one has to consider the bill before us.

The farmers were looking for—and certainly asking for—a great deal more than this. They were probably saying, in general terms, that they needed three times as much as is provided if they were to meet their obligations and have a reasonable net income.

When I travel around the country I find that a lot of people, particularly urban people, think that farmers are really floating in money, and that when the government announces a $1 billion program city people will say, "How much more do you want? You guys got $1 billion." The inference is that each farmer received $1 billion. However, when you boil this down and decipher the matter, for the grain producers in the Prairies it will probably average out to $6,000 or $7,000 per permit bookholder. If a farmer has an obligation on a debt of $300,000 or $400,000 at a rate of 13 per cent interest—which is what the Farm Credit Corporation is still charging on many of their loans—that amounts to $40,000 or $50,000 in interest payments alone. However, $7,000 is welcome, and it makes a few creditors happy for a short time, but it really does not meet the situation.

The single most important problem in the world grain markets today is the give-away program of the Government of the United States. We were able to live with—perhaps not as well as we would have liked—the subsidies of the European Economic Community, but when the United States got into this business and started putting a price tag of zero on certain quantities of grain going into the international market that, of course, depressed world prices to no end.

I said a year ago, and I repeat—and I draw this to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate—there should be a cap placed on the payments. I was glad that that principle was adopted and that a cap, a maximum payment for an individual producer, was placed at $25,000.

[Senator Leblanc]

Personally, I would have been much happier with a lower cap than that which would have resulted, of course, in a higher average payment. I would think that this kind of a program should be targeted in that way.

Although I was unable to attend, as I read the evidence that was taken at the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, it appears that some 750 farmers received the maximum and who, without the cap, would have received more. The cap has not affected a very large number of farmers, but certainly I think it is all to the good that that principle is in place.

I believe the government needs to take a different approach or a stronger approach with the United States. I feel that when George Shultz was in Ottawa some two or three weeks ago our Secretary of State for External Affairs should have, once again, raised with him the great difficulty that the American program is causing for all the grain producers of the world.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): He did say that.

Senator Argue: If the Leader of the Government would look at his reply to a question which I asked, he will see that he did not say that. However, I will take his word for it. However, he was not able to give me that advice when I asked him before. I should now like to know in what terms he raised it.

Senator Murray: I do not have a transcript of those conversations so the honourable senator can hardly expect me to say exactly what was said by Mr. Clark and Mr. Shultz.

The Honourable senator concluded, quite wrongly, as usual—

Senator Argue: You don't have to throw that in!

Senator Murray: —concluded quite wrongly from the replies I gave him some days ago that the matter had not been raised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am telling him that it was raised on that occasion, as it has been raised on previous occasions to which I referred and as it has been raised in the leadership role by Canada at the OECD, at the GATT, at the Cairns Group of Agriculture Exporting Countries and, as I say, in all of our bilateral discussions with the United States.

Senator Olson: What was Mr. Shultz's response?

Senator Argue: I think a careful reading of the exchange I had with the Leader of the Government the other day on this subject will show that the Leader of the Government did not say categorically that it had been raised at that time.

Senator Murray: No, but the honourable senator said quite categorically that it had not been raised.

Senator Argue: Somewhat later the Leader of the Government said it was raised. I think that if it had been raised in a strong way this member of the cabinet would have known it at that time, but it was done in such a quiet, ineffective way—

Senator Doody: No, no!

Senator Argue:—that the press didn't know it was raised and the agricultural press didn't know it was raised. It was certainly not raised in the same strong terms that were used in raising the question of acid rain. So this isn't put forward in a strong way.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: How do you know?

Senator Argue: Well, it was not taken up by the press, and the press usually know.

Senator Doody: Oh, the press know?

Senator Argue: Just keep wagging your head—either up or down, it does not make much difference which way it goes. If it had been important, it would have been in the press release. Joe Clark would not have been bashful, he would have been out saying how he really got a hold of George Shultz and talked to him about the grain situation. But it wasn't that at all.

They then brought us the Free Trade Agreement that cancels $280 million in the two-price system.

Senator Murray: It was very popular with the Liberals.

Senator Argue: No, not at all. I had the honour to attend a meeting of 300 people, in the town of Humboldt a week ago Monday, and heard not a single comment from anyone in the audience—although they commented for more than an hour—in favour of the Mulroney free-trade deal, but I heard from those opposed to it.

Senator Murray: I simply want to remind my friend that the latest poll on this matter taken by his friend, the Angus Reid firm—

Senator Frith: Our friend? Is he your friend, Senator Argue?

Senator Murray: Well, he was the pollster for Mr. Turner. That poll shows that 47 per cent of the respondents on the Prairies are in favour of the Free Trade Agreement.

Senator Olson: They are not asking the farmers!

Senator Murray: Indeed, that 47 per cent is a higher percentage than any other region, except Quebec, where 55 per cent are in favour of it.

Senator Olson: Did they ask farmers?

Senator Doody: Very sensible!

Senator Argue: Well, the leadership of the farm movement that I pay some attention to are not lauding this trade agreement.

Senator Barootes: Which one is that?

Senator Argue: The farmers have—

Senator Barootes: Which one is that?

Senator Argue: It is not your Western Grain Growers Association—it is not those.

The fact is that by this trade agreement the farmers have lost $280 million from the two-price system. The government says that they will make it up in deficiency payments by increasing the deficit to pay it, because that is a more business-like way to deal with the situation. The farmers were quite happy and supportive of getting the two-price system out of the market in Canada, but that will be gone.

Senator Murray: And 40 per cent of Liberal respondents are in favour of it.

Senator Argue: And instead of that, the government has said in this deal that "We will send a little more wheat into the United States."

Senator Murray: That is up from 32 per cent.

Senator Argue: As soon as the announcement was made—not more wheat going into the United States but just the announcement—the National Wheat Growers Association in the United States was up in arms. They went to Washington. The government got them all excited. Instead of slipping a little more wheat into the U.S. market, the market will probably be shut off if this trade agreement should ever take place.

I think there will be just about as much luck in Washington with this trade agreement as the President of the United States had yesterday in the vote in the House of Representatives, where he was trying to get some more money to keep a war going in Nicaragua that most people thought should be ended by peace negotiations.

In any event, the Canadian Wheat Board has been quite successful over the years in developing a market for Canadian wheat in the U.S. I think the United States turns out to be our fifteenth best customer. However, the Canadian Wheat Board sells wheat in the United States whenever the American millers think it is a good buy. The Canadian Wheat Board—and this has been going on for many years—is cautious and careful. When some eruption in Congress is seen they do not sell any more for a while, but when things kind of die down they sell a little more. Now it is all so-called "out in the open." I would venture to suggest that if the trade deal should ever go through—and I do not expect it ever will go through—there will be less Canadian wheat sold in the United States and a lot more American wheat sold in Canada, resulting in marketing programs being much more difficult to achieve.

Senator Murray: Will the Senate block the Free Trade Agreement?

Senator Frith: Can we? Present it to us! Are you going to present it to us?

Senator Argue: Come on, bring it on! We will deal with that when we get to it.

Senator Frith: A different question!

Senator Argue: As part of the government's agricultural program I would like to have seen a cancellation, reduction and restructuring of debt for a lot of young farmers out there who are heavily in debt, but who are technically good farmers. The government said that they will not do that. They do not want to go in that direction, they want to let the creditors in and often foreclose. But in the announcement in December the same government that was not prepared to cancel any of the debt, or to have it rolled back for individual farmers dealing with farm credit or other creditors, said, "Oh, the Western Grain Stabilization Act is deeply in the red in the amount of $1.5 million. We will not fire the management, because their recommendations got us in trouble; we will not blame anyone. The international price for grain is down, and that is why the WGSa deficit is so high. We will cancel $750 million." A government that isn't able to have any laws that give farmers a right to a write-down with their creditors has been able to cancel $750 million as a deficit in the WGSa.

I suppose there will be amendments to the WGSa in the weeks or months to come. I express the hope that when we see those amendments there will be no increase in the maximum amount on which a producer can contribute. Today a producer can contribute on up to $60,000 of income, and I think that is high enough. If it should be increased, then all it means is that the money which is paid out will be paid out more to a certain few and less to the rank-and-file farmer.

When I was the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and in charge of the WGSa we had to look at how it was functioning. There was a tremendous demand then by many producers to get out of the fund and withdraw their money. They were saying, "Look, we paid in for a large number of years and have received little or nothing from the fund; we want out." It was my opinion at that time that the way things were going there could well be some substantial payments made in the future. My recommendation to the cabinet—and it went through Parliament—was that the day on which producers could get out of the program would be postponed for more than two years, and if payments were made they would not want out of the fund. The wisdom of doing that kind of thing has been proven. The demand now is not for farmers to get out of the fund; the demand is to make it easier for people who are not in the fund to join the fund and be paid out at an earlier date than is currently provided for by the terms of the WGSa. So, amendments will need to be made.

I hope that the farmers will not be called on to pay a heavy contribution into the fund, that the ceiling will not be increased, and that steps will be taken to make certain that the fund is structured in such a way that if grain prices continue at their current level the fund will continue to pay out large sums of money. It is structured now, as I understand it, so that as prices go down it triggers large payments, but if you get into a valley when the low prices are continued for a number of years the payments dry up. I hope that when this is being restructured it will be done in such a way that payments can be made out.

Senator Barootes: It is not "dried up," you mean "lessened to the five-year average."

Senator Argue: Well, we will not go that far. I hope it will be structured in such a way that if the prices should remain at a low figure payments of the magnitude that farmers have received recently will be continued in the future

There have been some changes made to the program, and I welcome the inclusion of summer fallow. I think that the one-third provision is a little onerous. I think it might well have been half of the acreage. But, in any event, it has been recognized that in a large part of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and perhaps in some parts of Manitoba, summer fallow is a normal practice, and to have an act which does not include summer fallow is really an indication to farmers that they should have a larger seeded acreage. At a time when I think we would all agree that it might be better to have less production it was an encouragement to have greater production.

I would think that some further changes might well be made in this program—everything would need to be on a voluntary basis—and that there should be a larger sum of money allocated for summer fallow as an encouragement to producers to cut back on their total acreage where it seemed wise to do so. Certainly we can all support this measure. I do not believe that it goes far enough, and I believe that further changes should be made. Many changes are required to our agricultural policies in this country if the exodus of farmers from the land, particularly in western Canada, is to be halted and if our agricultural and rural communities are to be kept viable.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, it had not been my intention to speak on Bill C-108, but there are two or three things which impel me to do so. The first is to again extend to Senator Olson, for his very kind and helpful remarks, the invitation that I offered once before, namely, that, in view of his great acquiescence to what is being done by the Government of Canada, we do have room on this side of the house for him at any time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: We are great friends, and I appreciate his help. The other thing that impels me to speak is that Senator Argue, today, finally has agreed that this is a very helpful bill; and I am sure that all of us feel some relief that that has happened.

We all know that the Canadian farmers are hurting, and hurting badly, because of low grain prices. Those prices are undoubtedly the effect of unfair practice in the international marketing area. We are caught in the crossfire as a marketer of grain. Prices for grains and oilseeds are now at the lowest level in real dollar terms that they have been in the last 50 years.

In 1986 the federal government responded to the severe financial problem facing Canadian farmers by consulting with farm groups and creating the Special Canadian Grains Program, which is the subject of Bill C-108. This year the program is being extended to provide assistance for the 1987 crop year. Also, this year the government is changing the program so that most of the money going to farmers through this program will be in their hands in the spring of this year, before seeding, which was one of the pleas made by our friends on the other side last year.

We are being asked to look at the bill at this time in order to be able to include that first grain payment in March of this year. I should add that the second payment will be made probably in June, before the start of the summer inputs and the harvesting. Therefore, this money will come at a very timely juncture.

As has been mentioned, the first payment will be $803 million, which is quite substantial. The second payment, in June, will be around $300 million. In total, in this fiscal year, the sum of $1.5 billion will have been paid to Canadian farmers through this Special Canadian Grains Program—because, as honourable senators will recall, some of the payment from the first program fell into this year.

Including the money which farmers received in that year—in the first program and this program—it represents a very substantial input of dollars into the grain industry. In my opinion, there is no doubt that without the Special Canadian Grains Program our Canadian farmers could not pay the bills for putting in their crop and for harvesting it this year.

As has been said, this is not because Canadian farmers are inefficient or bad managers. Our farmers are caught in the crossfire between the United States and the European Economic Community. Price support programs from them are linked to production so that farmers are encouraged to produce more and more. In order to dispose of the surplus from that heavy production, those countries are subsidizing their exports. With a great deal of grain on the market the Canadian Wheat Board and our farmers are forced to sell at bargain-basement prices.

Therefore, we all agree—and I include our friends on the other side—that ending subsidies is the real solution to the problem faced by Canadian grain farmers. The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the Minister for International Trade, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister have all taken advantage of each and every international forum they have attended to make the case for ending agricultural export subsidies—and I might add parenthetically that the Saskatchewan Minister of Agriculture, Premier Grant Devine, has been working like a beaver to accelerate and push this process.

Canada is actually committed to reducing international subsidies, but farmers will not see those results for two, three or more years. The government knows that farmers cannot afford to wait for that to happen. As Senator Olson has said, some harbingers have recently shown that there may be some correction of those low prices.

The return that farmers are getting for their grain is so low that, at this time, we urgently need to help them with some kind of support program, such as the Western Grains Stabilization Program and this special program.

In 1986 the government responded by creating the Special Canadian Grains Program to compensate farmers for the drop in world prices. The government talked to farmers and to farm organizations from every part of this country about the kind of program that was needed and how it could best be delivered—and it followed the advice it received. The result is the program that is now before us as a supplementary estimate amounting to over $1 billion, of which $803 million will be distributed this year.

While the program will compensate our farmers for losses, the Special Canadian Grains Program does not affect the decision of farmers about what and how they should plan. No direction is given to them about that. That is very important when Canada goes to other countries to talk about eliminating their support programs, which, on the other hand, are designed to encourage farmers to grow a surplus. Senator Argue was good enough to touch on that in connection with summer fallow and special crops programs.

Without the Special Canadian Grains Program many of our grain and oilseed producers today would be out of business. According to a recent survey of farmers eligible for this program, the payment put them on a break-even basis—and I wish to emphasize this. Farmers are using the money from this payment to reduce their debts and to buy the farm inputs that they need, and when the farmers are in business so are the implement dealers, so are the fertilizer dealers, and so are all of the people in businesses related to agriculture. So these dollars will help to keep other small businesses in the rural areas alive.

Senator Argue reminded us that the payment from this program this year will probably amount to $6,000 or $7,000—it is probably closer to $8,000—per farmer. Let us leave it at $7,000. He is happy that the top payment to be made will be $25,000, and I, too, think that is a good thing. In fact, he suggests that the payment should be lower so that there will be more money to spread around among the other farmers. He also puts forward the premise that farmers require and desire three times the $1.1 billion. If my friend multiplies that $8,000 by three, he will reach close to the $25,000 top that he said was too high to begin with, so there is a little contradiction somewhere in this. I can say that I am pleased with the $25,000 top payment, so that the big industrial farmer does not take advantage of the smaller farmer, who is indeed in need.

Honourable senators, the Special Canadian Grains Program is vital to the survival of farmers and farming communities all across Canada. The farm community was almost universally pleased when the Prime Minister announced the extension of the program in December. There were only a few murmurs of discontent.

The Special Canadian Grains Program, however, is only a short-term solution to the problems Canadian farmers are facing. In December the Prime Minister announced a series of both short and long-term incentives to help farmers survive the drop in world grain prices. Including the Special Canadian Grains Program, these initiatives represent the biggest support package for the industry in Canadian history.

To help farmers meet their immediate needs, in addition to that program, there is the farm fuel tax rebate program, which has been extended to 1991, saving farmers approximately $400 million. The farm debt review boards and the Canadian Rural Transition Program have been extended to help farmers in financial difficulty until 1991, at a cost of approximately $400 million.

To help farmers meet their long-term needs the Farm Credit Corporation has been given extra funding of $30 million for this fiscal year and $100 million in each of the next three years.

As we heard from the two gentlemen who entertained us in the Agriculture Committee the other day, there is a great deal of explanation as to how this works. Indeed, through the Farm Credit Corporation, with commodity-based loans, many of these farmers are able to reconstruct their loans down to as low as 6 per cent. That does not apply to farmers borrowing in the private sector but only to farmers borrowing through the FCC. With the money that has been made available through the FCC some help is being given to a considerable portion of our farm community.

We were somewhat concerned about how the Farm Debt Review Board works, and went into this in a fair amount of detail in committee. I regret that Senator Argue was not there to put his good and cogent questions to these gentlemen.

Senator Argue: I have attended quite a number of those meetings, although perhaps not all of them.

Senator Barootes: He missed this one, however.

Senator Argue: I had more important duties at the time.

Senator Barootes: It was pointed out to us that there were some difficulties, and I sympathize very much with those young, efficient farmers, who, through—what should I say—misfortune—that is the kindest term I can use—

Senator Argue: They listened to the banks!

Senator Barootes: —got into debt at a time of high interest rates. I, too, wish that sooner or later something can be done to ameliorate that problem. Perhaps that is something we can look at down the way. There is nothing now to be done, except through the Farm Credit Corporation, to lower the payments for those farmers. There may be a misunderstanding in this regard, and that misunderstanding is that people from the FCC do not have the right to say to the credit unions or the banks, "You write this man's debt down. He borrowed thousands of dollars and we want you to write it down." That is not the way the FCC was designed to work. It was explained to us that it is to work as a mediator to bring the debtor and the creditor together and to bring to their attention facts which, as was said, some of them were not even aware of in some instances. Then, between the two parties, some kind of voluntary decision is taken that could help one, the other or both. I think it was made quite clear that write-downs are not the order of the day, nor does the FCC have the authority to tell the banks or the credit unions that they have no access to the farmers' money or assets. In summary, the FCC tries to make re-arrangements that will enable the farmer to survive on his land for the time being.

[Senator Barootes.]

To help farmers meet their long-term needs the Farm Credit Corporation is being given an extra $30 million this year and $100 million over the next three years, for a total of $330 million. The Western Grain Stabilization Program, of which Senator Argue spoke, is being changed to encourage more farmers to join it. Additionally, it is being revitalized and re-established by infusions of cash from the general treasury, since it has already expended all of the moneys that were available to it in funds from its insurance collection scheme.

The federal government is willing to spend up to $100 million on joint ventures with the provinces. These include research on ethanol blended gasolines, initiatives in soil conservation, and an agricultural research centre in western Canada.

I thank honourable senators for their general support of this bill, despite their minor criticisms. We know that the farmers need some help, and they are going to get it. The farmers know they can count on this government to help them survive the drop in world grain prices for as long as that difficulty exists. The federal government is actively working internationally to put an end to the subsidy battles between the U.S. and the EEC, but the negotiating process is slow, and farmers need financial support if they are going to make it through the drop in commodity prices. This government is committed to providing that support through programs like the Special Canadian Grains Program, the subject of this bill.

If I may, I will conclude by saying that never in recent history, in my memory, have the farmers of Canada, through no fault of their own, been in such a difficult financial state. And never in Canada's history has a government responded so quickly, so willingly and so generously to bring them the support that they require.

Senator Argue: And the foreclosures continue.

Senator Olson: If I may, I will ask Senator Barootes a question. I wonder whether he understood clearly what I meant when I talked about the money that was being made available to the Farm Credit Corporation to pay down some of the interest. I was not asking for write-downs. Senator Barootes is not talking about the same people as I am. People who owe their money to a credit union, a bank or an institution other than the FCC have no funding to help them with their debts. That is what we are talking about. Does he understand that? It does not matter how much is given to the FCC. If a farmer does not owe money to that institution, he is not getting much help.

Senator Barootes: In answer I will say that you are partially correct, and I agree. The Farm Debt Review Board, as you yourself have said, has been funded with $40 million, of which, as you also said, approximately $39.3 million is for administration. These farm debt review boards, which consist of a chairman and two other farmers who have no vested interest in a particular situation, bring the information that they have, together with the information that the bank has, and provide it to the farmers. The $39.3 million is an expenditure of this government, or of any government, to assist those farmers who have debts with banks and credit unions as well as those who have debts with the FCC. There is an extra fund available for those who have debts with the FCC, in case there are some sums of money required to stretch out and help that farmer.

● (1520)

Therefore, that approximately $40 million has not been set aside only for clients of the FCC but also for clients of banks and credit unions, and that is the kind of money I was speaking of.

Senator Olson: The problem I have with that explanation is that that money is for administration, and they do not bring any money to the table to help pay the interest.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, yesterday, as I introduced this bill, Senator Stewart asked me one question; he asked me if I could try to determine for him when the government intended tabling the Main Estimates. I have made inquiries and I can only say that it is the hope of the government to have those estimates ready before the end of March. The target date, I believe, is somewhere between the middle and the end of March. I have been unable to ascertain a more definite date than that. However, if I receive further information on that matter, I will certainly be only too happy to provide it for Senator Stewart.

I would like to thank the senators who participated in this debate. It was a very informative one. With these few comments I commend second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to note for the record that normally we allow the full day's notice provided for by the rules between the adoption of second reading and dealing with third reading. However, we have always made an exception if the bill is unopposed and if Royal Assent is planned for the same day. In that case we often accelerate the process. As I understand it, there will be Royal Assent later today, so I think the bill should receive third reading now.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the cooperation, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

4 February 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gerald Eric Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 4th day of February, 1988, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy and Program

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations) moved the second reading of Bill C-83, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill comes to us from the House of Commons with the explanation that it is the result of certain reforms that have taken place in the practices and procedures of that chamber.

The bill provides remuneration for members of that chamber who have special responsibilities as the representatives of their parties in that House. They include the Deputy House Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition; the Deputy House Leader of any party that has 12 or more members of that House; the National Caucus chairpersons of the government or of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition; and the National Caucus chairpersons of any party with 12 or more members of that chamber.

The bill also provides for remuneration for members of the House of Commons who are chairpersons of standing committees, including standing joint committees; chairpersons of legislative committees of that House; and chairpersons of special committees of that House.

I do not intend to discuss this bill at any length today, beyond providing the explanation that I have just conveyed to honourable senators. I understand that there is some interest on the part of honourable senators in seeing this bill referred to one of our standing committees for consideration so that we may consider at the same time the implications this bill might have for this chamber, because it is, after all, a bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Therefore, honourable senators, in placing the bill before you for second reading I put honourable senators on notice that, at the end of second reading, it will be my intention to move that the bill be sent to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration of this place for their consideration.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I can understand the lack of enthusiasm on the part of the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate in his glowing support of this bill. Before I move the adjournment, I would like to say to the honourable senator that my preference would be for a very, very long adjournment of this debate. However, I shall restrain myself and simply say that I move the adjournment of the debate at this time.

• (1530)

On motion of Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Doyle moved the second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Senate for allowing me to proceed with second reading this afternoon. This will permit me to go with the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to carry the good news contained in Bill C-55 to the Canadian West.

My friend, Senator Baroote, advises me that, notwithstanding the wonders being wrought by medical science, prospects are that only the pages among us will be alive and kicking in the year 2052. That is when we might expect Parliament, if it proceeds at its historical pace, to next consider Canada's Copyright Act.

Sixty-four turbulent years have passed since Royal Assent was given to the present act, and we have gone from Geoffrey O'Hara to Corey Hart and from Lucy Maude Montgomery to Margaret Atwood without substantial revision of the legislation which gives a creator the exclusive right to copy his or her work or to give permission to someone else to do so. In three-score and four years we have tinkered the old act up and made it do in the establishment of the right to publish, produce, reproduce, translate, broadcast or adapt a work or to perform it in public. Copyright applies to all original literary, dramatic, musical and artistic works, such as books, songs, sculptures, paintings, photographs and films. It protects the literary form of what you read in newspapers. News itself cannot be copyrighted, although you might try to inhibit that through the trademark legislation, as the Canadian Olympic Association has attempted to do with its action in the courts.

Over the years we have stretched the Copyright Act of 1924 to cover products unknown to the men who framed it. The act includes, for instance, provisions for the protection of audio and visual tapes, even the naughty ones. But the band-aids, the pink string and sealing wax used to patch the legislation have long since become obvious, as has the need to overhaul our entire approach to regulation of the use we make of intellectual property. Property, that is what we are dealing with, as surely as if we were talking about the family farm. Creations of the mind and spirit are as vital to the health and vigour of a nation as any of its natural or material treasures and far more vulnerable to neglect and maltreatment. Michael I. Pitman, for a seminar of Canadian publishers, put it this way:

The great benefit that copyright has brought to our society has been that, by controlling the right to intellectual property and its exploitation, it has provided an incentive to artists and other creators to produce new works.

The ultimate answer to the why of copyright is that it has successfully stood the test of time, and there is no reason to suppose that it will not continue to do so.

Invariably, copyright law has to be adapted to meet new challenges, normally in the form of technological innovation. The challenge of technical innovation today is really no different from that of the past. The same technology which causes the challenge can be used advantageously in finding new solutions. Copyright itself has not failed our society. We have been slow sometimes in recognizing the need for change and in being imaginative enough to introduce change. It is worth remembering, however, that the major country that abandoned copyright in its revolution, the U.S.S.R., has recently reintroduced copyright and has become a member of the Universal Copyright Convention, mainly to enjoy the reciprocal benefit of international copyright. There seems to be a lesson here which should not be lost on us.

There are many reasons for copyright, but the most important one is that it works.

I should tell honourable senators that those words have been copyrighted by the University of Toronto Press, and you would be well advised not to make use of them beyond these precincts without permission. I might also note that the words were written in 1981, and the message of "need for change" has been in limbo since, a situation that in no way could be blamed on want of irritation or agitation.

Bill C-60 is not this government's complete response to the chorus of calls for change. It is what the minister, the Honourable Flora MacDonald, calls the first phase. Other aspects of copyright will be dealt with in legislation which may come to us as early as the fall of this year. Bill C-60 proposes nine major amendments to the law as it now stands. I commend them to the careful consideration of a committee of this chamber, and touch upon them only briefly today. What six of the nine amendments have in common is that they are intended to benefit our cultural industries and individual creators.

First is the stimulation of the establishment of collectives such as those which now deal with music. It is intended that these organizations which negotiate and collect royalties for creators will be supplemented by new kinds of collectives dealing in all areas of copyright protection. Second is extension, through a new agency, of the Copyright Appeal Board, which now deals only with music or performing rights. The powers of the board will be expanded to deal with other collectives as well. Third is the strengthening of moral rights protection for creators. The powers in this section will be expanded. Here we are caught up with the issues of an artist's right to safeguard his name and his creation, even though ownership may be held by another. It is most frequently epitomized by the attempt of the Eaton Centre in Toronto to tie red ribbons around Michael Snow's sculptured geese. Fourth is extended protection of choreographic works, which are now treated as dramatic subjects with plots or specific sequences. The amending bill goes further and recognizes compositions which are simply visually aesthetic expressions.

● (1540)

Senator Frith: The third was the strengthening of moral rights protection to creators. What was the fourth?

Senator Doyle: The fourth is extended protection of choreographic works.

Fifth is abolition of compulsory licences for the protection of sound recordings. As things stand, you or I have the right to make our own recording of any musical composition once a first recording has been produced. The price is something of a bargain—it is two cents a copy, the same as it was in 1924 when Al Jolson was selling "Swanee". Under Bill C-60, composers can negotiate royalty rates freely with recording companies, a clause that should make Gordon Lightfoot smile once he gets over all of those songs already under the two-penny bridge.

Sixth is the right to exhibit artistic works in public, which will provide artists with a new, legal right to compensation when their works are displayed in public.

There are three other major aspects of the legislation which are the shared concern of the Minister of Communications and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

First, the bill protects software creators by including computer programs—hardly anticipated in 1924—under literary works. We Canadians have been robbing these authors blind for years.

Second, penalties will be increased for commercial dealings in unauthorized copies. As things are, the maximum penalty for unauthorized copying is a fine of $200, which is totally inadequate. It is probable, however, that a Senate committee will want to examine the bill's provision of $1 million fines and five-year jail terms for conviction on indictment of copyright infringement; at least before they Xerox 60 copies of that snappy article in Saturday Night.

Third, Bill C-60 will provide an objective means for determining whether an article, gimcrack or what-have-you can be protected by copyright, industrial design or both.

Minister MacDonald said in the other place that the obvious urgency of copyright reform impelled the government to proceed in two stages. She said:

The matters to be addressed in the second phase have just as high a priority as those in C-60. But because of the complexity of these issues, the drafting of legislation to address them has not yet been completed.

We should, honourable senators, be concerned not only with Bill C-60 but with those complexities beyond; concerned perhaps that matters left out of Bill C-60 remain on the agenda and are not lost between the stools. We may want to review the arguments for the exceptions from the application of the copyright law, such as those proposed by Erik Spicer who presides over our Parliamentary Library.

We might also wish to examine the possibility of copyright being used as a means of destruction rather than protection. Now, that might seem to be an unlikely hazard, but might I take just a few minutes more of your time to deal with a very real problem described in a letter I have received from David Eustace, who is proprietor of the Nostalgia Cinema in Toronto. He writes:

What I am most concerned about is that in granting copyright ownership, it be stressed that such ownership by a corporation or individual must not be used to destroy works, either physically or by withholding their distribution. I am thinking mainly of film. We have the example many times over in the United States where motion picture films have been destroyed to save storage costs, or to make way for a re-make. According to the American Film Institute, Los Angeles, 50 per cent of motion picture films registered for copyright in the U.S. before 1951 is destroyed. This includes many films considered works of art by film critics. Of course, the reasons for films being lost or destroyed are many and include film companies going bankrupt, wilful destruction, deterioration of negatives, and plain neglect.

Some films have survived solely on account of an individual tucking a copy away privately. This is far too chancy a way for a country to preserve an important part of its culture. Yet such was the case of "The Milky Way".

This favourite film of movie star comedian, Harold Lloyd, was an enormous success in 1936. Sam Goldwyn decided to re-make it ten years later as a vehicle for Danny Kaye. Now called "The Kid From Brooklyn", it was launched only when Goldwyn's company had bought up all rights to "The Milky Way" and ordered all copies and negatives destroyed. That "The Kid From Brooklyn" is the much inferior film is not even the point. The point is a company had completely destroyed (or attempted to in this case) the work of another. (A private collector managed to latch onto a print in 16 mm so at least one can see "The Milky Way" now if one seeks out obscure museums and archives.)

Surely ownership of copyright in film is not meant to give an individual or a corporation the right to destroy the work of another. Even if I write, produce and direct a film with my own money—

And I might inject here that this is something that David Eustace has done.

—I should not have the rights, once the work is edited and completed, to destroy the performances of others; the cinematography by a cameraman, the dancing and choreography of another, the music written by yet another. This is not the case of Ayn Rand's architect destroying what is his; the vast majority of film encompasses many other arts and talents.

I might say that what almost happened to "The Milky Way" did happen to the first film version—made in 1921—of Lucy Maude Montgomery's "Ann of Green Gables". None of us will ever see that film.

Eustace goes on to discuss possible legislative remedies, but whether the question he raises was forgotten in phase one of Bill C-60, or is intended for study in phase two, it is one that honourable senators might want to ask as they examine the salutary thrust of the legislation now before us.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Grafstein, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Rule 67(1)(d) of the Rules of the Senate), presented in the Senate on February 3, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Third Report of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders was presented in the Senate yesterday. It is very short, and I would ask the Senate to adopt the report.

We have a slight problem, however, because the French text is not correct. Where it reads:

Le comité mixte d'examen réglementaire

We have a problem here because, in fact, it should read:

... d'examen de la réglementation.

Unfortunately, something went wrong in the translation, and the request came to us in this form from the House of Commons. The request originated from the same committee that is requesting the name change.

We discussed this with the House of Commons, and it was suggested that we adopt the report as is and just amend the Rules. For the time being, I am not going to suggest that the Rules be reprinted because we intend to ask the Committee to send us its request a second time, duly corrected. So we will make the correction at that time. Senator Doody—

[Senator Doyle]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does that mean—

[English]

Senator Molgat: The problem is that the French text is incorrectly translated.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Senator Molgat, do you want us to adopt a version of the committee's report that is not acceptable? Why don't we wait for the corrected version?

Senator Molgat: I think the problem is that if we wait, the committee will be in a difficult position. In fact, we will be calling the committee by one name and the other place will be calling it by another name. The committee has work to do.

If we adopt the report now, the committee can continue its work, make the change in the French text and send it back.

That is the problem we have to deal with.

Senator Frith: In that case, Senator Molgat, perhaps your solution is the more pragmatic one.

Senator Molgat: Indeed, Senator Frith. I think we should accept the report, refrain from reprinting the Rules, and wait. The committee will then exist under its new name in both chambers, which is important, since it is a joint committee. It then meets again, asks for a change in the French text and subsequently we return their request.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[English]

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Rule 112 of the Rules of the Senate), presented in the Senate on February 3, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, this is again a request from another committee—in this case a committee of this place, and not a joint committee. It is a request by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration simply asking for a later reporting date for the reports of the Clerk.

The fiscal year was changed, and at the time that was done our own rule was not changed. The Clerk and the Director of Finance find it impossible to make the report in the month of May, as our rule presently prescribes, and request that it be done in the month of October.

The members of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders have discussed this in detail. At that time there were members present from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and the committee recommends that the change be made.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Gigantès calling the attention of the Senate to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will try to be brief in my concluding remarks. I have great sadness in my heart, because I see that too many people both in this chamber and outside of this chamber have not considered some of the truly vital issues involved in this debate. Unfortunately, the debate will last another seven years. We cannot avoid trade with the United States. We want this trade to be as free as possible, but we are now involved in a bilateral relationship with a giant, and we will have to harmonize our policies over the next seven years to produce a level playing field. Imagine, if you will, a Canadian football field. The space between the goal line and the ten-yard line at one end is the Canadian space, and the rest of the field is the American space. If it is going to be level, I submit it will be the Canadian space that will be brought to the level of the American space. In many instances that level is lower than ours.

I deplore this agreement, because there is no mention of what the Prime Minister said on April 2, 1987, was his principal goal—a binding dispute-settlement mechanism. We have a dispute-settlement mechanism, but, in the final analysis, the bottom line of that mechanism is that if either of the two parties does not like what the dispute-settlement mechanism has produced it need not obey, and the other party can retaliate. There is no other reading of the text.

Now, the elephant and the mouse. Senator Cogger obviously is an “elephantophile”—he loves elephants. I have a weakness for mice.

Senator Cogger: I just said that I had heard that line before.

Senator Gigantès: Well, it is worth repeating.

There are often comparisons made by the government to the European Common Market. They have a dispute-settlement mechanism; they have a commission. However, the four largest members of the 12-member board of that commission have eight votes. The remaining eight nations—the smaller ones—have nine votes. In our case, with the United States, there is one giant and one dwarf. In the Common Market the small nations can join together and thwart the giants. In any case, there are four giants and they can be divided, and have been repeatedly.

Moreover, the Common Market commission can appeal to the Common Market Court. The Common Market Court is a tribunal and does not apply the law of any of the participant members. The dispute-settlement mechanism will be applying U.S. law in the case of Canadian exports to the U.S. or Canadian law in the case of U.S. exports to Canada. The Common Market Court applies the law of the Common Market, and that law has evolved into a context in which the small members have the votes and the clout to ensure that one partner will not be dictated to by another. We are continually told that we have achieved that, but obviously we have not. We have given up an enormous amount to get this thing which, in fact, we will not get. We have given up the right to use our comparative advantage in energy. We have given up the right to use our comparative advantage in certain natural resources. We have given up the right to impose export taxes in order to ensure that things such as fish will be processed here rather than in the United States. We have given up far too much.

● (1600)

One of the arguments is: Then why do businessmen support it?

Senator Cogger: Why does Mr. Bourassa support it?

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Bourassa has gotten into bed with Mr. Mulroney, and I cannot say anything about that since they are consenting adults.

Businessmen are supporting it for either of two reasons. One is the belief in the myth of Adam Smith. Adam Smith, if one reads his text today, would have been horrified by the idea that trade could be regulated by what the Americans call trade remedy laws. These are obstacles to trade and are totally against the free market idea. That is what we will be applying in this bilateral mechanism. There is another reason, of course, that businessmen support it, especially big businessmen. If they are American subsidiaries, naturally they support it. If they are not American subsidiaries but big Canadian companies, you should read Eric Kierans' article in “Policy Options” of July if you want to see why they support it. To summarize, he says, in effect, that what this agreement gives large Canadian companies is U.S. corporate citizenship. They will be able to invest in the United States without being hassled. As you know, the Americans are very nationalistic in that they do tend to hassle people from abroad who come to invest in their country.

We have given up control of our banking system protection. We have given up control of our service industry protection. We have entered into arrangements which will allow the Americans to come in here and buy up any creative, small Canadian research company and move its technology and its best people south of the border.

The fate that is staring us in the face is the fate of the northern-tier states in the United States. They enjoy a free market, free trade arrangement, with the rest of the United States, but they have been growing much more slowly than Canadian provinces over the past 25 years. They have been growing much more slowly than the rest of the United States. They have been losing resources, investment and people to the rest of the United States. It is cheaper to build a factory where you do not have to heat it. It is cheaper to build a factory where the friendly sheriff will not allow a union to be formed.

I also object to the fact that our public servants were asked to write documents—including “A summary of the Free Trade Agreement”—which were distributed among us, and which are not an objective presentation of the deal, because the data about the deal is interspersed with government rhetoric about how beautiful it is. I do not think public servants should have that role. The equivalent American document is dry. It just gives the text. They have not fallen to the cheapness of using public servants—and here they are paid by the tax dollars of all Canadians—to write government propaganda.

Above all, I object to giving false hope to the less-developed regions of this country by telling them that this trade deal is going to cure their ills. The Common Market deal has not cured the ills of the less-developed regions of the Common Market, or even those ills to be found within each country of the Common Market. As I was saying to you earlier, the existence of free trade within the United States, among the 50 states, has not helped North Dakota or Idaho. This deal is not going to help our under-developed regions. We have had that explained to us by the Deputy Secretary of Finance. He admits it. Yet, government propaganda insists that it will happen. It is a bad deal. It is presented dishonestly.

The fate of the country is at stake, because what is quite clearly happening is that the mixture of private enterprise and government intervention, which was instituted by Sir John A. Macdonald himself and which was the basis of the creation of Canada—it was a reaction to the capricious and arbitrary trade actions of the United States which abrogated a trade agreement it had with Canada—is being eroded. But that is what brought Canada into existence. That mixture of private enterprise and government intervention, which is accepted, and has been accepted, by a majority of Canadians throughout our history, has, of course, displeased some business people, some ideologues, who think that Adam Smith lives. After many years they have given up the hope of convincing Canadians to get rid of this mixed economy through the ballot box, and now they are bringing about the change they want through a trade treaty with the United States, because we are going to have harmonization between their standards and ours. When you are harmonizing one-eleventh with ten-elevenths the ten-elevenths will prevail.

We are going to become a poorer version of the U.S.—another tier of the northern tier. We are going to have a less tolerant and less friendly society. One day we might even elect a non-existent president who has come to his exalted office, as has happened south of the border, through being a talking head on television, selling various products. He continues selling things and contradicting himself on important issues, showing that he does not understand. The power of the American lobbyists and of the American media will inflict things like that on us, and I regret it.

Happily, we have seven years of negotiations ahead of us. Honourable senators, whether there is a trade deal or not, we cannot avoid negotiating endlessly with the Americans. We shall do so to the end of time. The only salvation for the country is to ensure that we do not have at the head of our negotiations our current Prime Minister, who seems to think that any sacrifice is worthwhile in order to make a deal. It is very easy to make a deal if you give away everything. We are going to play strip poker with the Americans, and we should not have as Prime Minister the kind of strip poker player who gives away his shirt before the cards are dealt.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I may have misinterpreted Senator Gigantès opening comments, but I thought he expressed some “sadness,” as I remember his word, that there was a certain amount of indifference to the consequences of this agreement between Canada and the United States. This, therefore, would seem to me to be an appropriate time to note that the Senate is not treating the matter indifferently at all, and that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs—the committee that has already studied this subject and published three reports thereon—is taking this matter very seriously and is in the midst of a very thorough study of all aspects of this agreement. Let us make it clear that if Senator Gigantès does feel sad about some indifference about this agreement and its consequences that allegation of indifference certainly cannot be levelled at the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: I was not levelling it at the Senate but at some senators on this side, where, unfortunately, I have to sit for lack of space.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): You do not really, sir; there are various alternatives. Let me say that there is one senator who sits on this side who hopes to demonstrate shortly that he is somewhat enthusiastic rather than indifferent. With that, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED “EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE”—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: “In Training, Only Work Works” (Sub-committee on Training and Employment), tabled in the Senate on December 1, 1987.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my presentation will be very brief. It concerns the report produced by the Subcommittee on Training and Employment of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Senator Tremblay was so kind as to table the report on my behalf, since I had the privilege of chairing this subcommittee.

I want to thank Senator Tremblay for his tremendous co-operation and infinite patience with the work of the subcommittee.

If I may, I would like to thank committee members who took part in the subcommittee's work.

[English]

I will begin with the deputy chairman of the subcommittee, Senator Robertson, who was a great help and had a great knowledge of the field; and Senator David, who brought to this his knowledge of social issues and his care for education and the young. I have a special weakness for the role that Senator Mira Spivak played in this. We visited certain parts of the country together and she spoke to editorial boards, on the radio and on television on this report. I envied her her eloquence.

On the Liberal side of the house, I would like to express my thanks to Senator Bonnell, deputy chairman of the mother committee, and to the members of the subcommittee, Senator Marsden, Senator Rousseau and Senator Hébert. Without them this work would not have been completed.

I would also like to point out—I do not know if this is usual—that the subcommittee had an extremely able researcher, whom we have lost now to Mr. David Peterson's government, Miss Christine Dearing, who worked long and hard, and did splendid work in research, drafting organizing and policy advice. All the members of the subcommittee have great respect for her and wish her luck in the higher job she now occupies.

The report itself is brief. It looks fat, but most of it is evidence. It is organized for easy reading. On the English side it has a summary that takes a page and a half, which starts on page 3; the same summary is on the French side, and also starts on page 3. On the English side, the report starts on page 7 and ends on page 30.

[Translation]

On the French side, the report starts on page 7 and ends on page 35. The rest of this volume, which looks impressive, consists of the testimony of over fifty experts, each of whom we interviewed for three hours. The interviews were summarized and subsequently submitted to the interviewees. They, in turn, approved the summaries and corrected them if necessary, so that all views given are contained in this report. People reading the report will notice that we have conveyed the main philosophy reflected in the testimony of all the people we consulted.

I suggest that honourable senators read from page 29 to 35 on the French side.

[English]

On the English side, in pages 25 to 31, they present one recommendation of this report which was the subject of much research, and that is a combination of job creation and training. We found no one opposing it. Various provincial authorities examined it, liked it, and asked for more copies. We even have a letter from the OECD which asks us for more copies, saying that:

The study covers a subject which is getting increasing attention. I would be grateful if you could send additional copies.

It is a report which Senator Roblin kindly characterized as non-partisan. It is not aimed at criticizing this or previous governments. When it does criticize, it criticizes policies adopted by the Liberals as well as policies that are now being applied by the Conservatives. It was not done with the purpose of criticizing one party or the other. I do not have to tell you what the report contains. This is a chamber that does not contain any functional illiterates, and if you read the page and a half summary and it arouses your interest you can then read the other 23 or 24 pages of the report.

I am grateful to you for accepting the report and for listening to me this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak this order is considered debated.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons which reads as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANADA

Wednesday, February 3, 1988

ORDERED,—

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendments 8 and 13(e) made by the Senate to Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, but disagrees with amendments 4, 5(a), (b) and (c), 6(a) and (b), 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13(a) because this House believes they contradict the principles of the Bill for the following reasons:

Amendment 4 would exclude only criminals and war criminals from the refugee determination process, but would allow terrorists, spies and subversives to pursue a claim to refugee status, notwithstanding the fact that Article 33 of the UN Convention would permit the removal of these latter individuals to their countries of nationality or permanent residence, even if they were determined to be Convention refugees.

Amendment 5(a) would eliminate the authority of the Minister to direct a ship to leave or not to enter Canadian waters. This amendment would re-open a significant gap in Canada's ability to control its borders.

Amendments 5(b) and (c) arise out of Senate amendment 5(a), which is not acceptable, and are therefore inappropriate.

Amendments 6(a) and (b) would reverse the policy on which the Immigration Act, 1976 was based, which policy was not changed in the Bill as passed by this House. The amendments jeopardize the possibility of successfully prosecuting persons who profit from organizing illegal migration and from counselling fraud among refugee claimants.

Amendments 9 and 10 would restrict the ability of peace officers and immigration officers to act quickly to search for evidence of major offences under the Immigration Act, 1976, in exigent circumstances, where lives are at risk or where evidence with respect to those offences may be lost or destroyed.

Amendments 11 and 12 would restrict the ability of peace officers and immigration officers to execute search warrants which have been duly authorized by a justice of the peace, by denying explicit authority to break open containers where it is reasonably believed evidence will be found and by limiting the authority to execute these warrants at night.

Amendment 13(a) would reduce the initial period of detention without review from seven days to forty-eight hours, which would allow insufficient time for the gathering of information to substantiate allegations or to identify the individual, particularly when large groups of undocumented persons arrive at one time.

And that this House agrees with the principles set out in amendments 1, 2(a), 3, 7 and 13(b), (c) and (d), but would propose the following amendments:

Amendment 1 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 22 and 23 on page 1, and substitute the following:

(c) to deter those who assist in the illegal entry of persons into Canada and thereby minimize the"

Amendment 2 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 29 to 39, on page 4, and substitute the following:

(a) examine within seven days, in camera, the security or criminal intelligence reports considered by the Minister and the Solicitor General and hear any other evidence or information that may be presented by or on behalf of those Ministers and may, on the request of the Minister or the Solicitor General, hear all or part of such evidence or information in the absence of the person named in the certificate and any counsel representing the person where, in the opinion of the Chief Justice or the designated judge, as the case may be, the evidence or information should not be disclosed on the grounds that such disclosure would be injurious to national security or to the safety of persons;"

Amendment 3 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 7 to 12, on page 5, and substitute the following:

(d) determine whether the certificate filed by the Minister and the Solicitor General is reasonable on the basis of the evidence and information available to the Chief Justice or the designated judge, as the case may be, and, if found not to be reasonable, quash the certificate; and"

Amendment 7 be amended to read as follows:

"Add, immediately after line 6, on page 10, the following:

95.21 No proceedings for an offence under section 95.1 or section 95.2 shall be instituted except by or with the personal consent in writing of the Attorney General of Canada or Deputy Attorney General of Canada."

Amendment 13(b) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 1 to 22, on page 21, and substitute the following:

(2) Where, with respect to a person detained under subsection (1), the Minister certifies in writing

(a) that

(i) the person's identity has not been established, or

(ii) the Minister has reason to suspect that the person may be a member of an inadmissible class described in paragraph 19(1)(e), (f) or (g), and

(b) that an additional period of detention is required to investigate the matter referred to in subparagraph (a)(i) or (ii), the person shall be brought before an adjudicator forthwith and at least once during every seven-day period thereafter, at which times the adjudicator shall review the reasons for the person's continued detention."

Amendment 13(c) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 23 to 47, on page 21, and substitute the following:

(2.1) Where the Minister has issued a certificate under subsection (2), the Minister may amend the certificate to which the detention relates to include any matter referred to in subparagraph (2)(a)(i) or (ii), following which the person shall be brought before an adjudicator forthwith and at least once during every seven-day period thereafter, at which times the adjudicator shall review the reasons for the person's continued detention.

(3) Where a person is detained under subsection (1) and the Minister has not issued a certificate under subsection (2), the person shall be brought before an adjudicator forthwith after the expiration of the period during which the person is being detained and that person shall be brought before an adjudicator at least once during every seven-day period thereafter, at which times the reasons for continued detention shall be reviewed."

Amendment 13(d) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 48 to 50, on page 21, and lines 1 to 18, on page 22, and substitute the following:

(4) Where an adjudicator who conducts a review under subsection (2) or (2.1) is satisfied that reasonable efforts are being made by the Minister to investigate the matter referred to in subparagraph (2)(a)(i) or (ii), the adjudicator shall continue the person's detention.

(4.1) Every review under subsection (2) or (2.1) of the detention of a person suspected of being a member of an inadmissible class described in paragraph 19(1)(e), (f) or (g) shall be conducted in camera.

(4.2) Where

(a) the Minister is of the opinion that any evidence or information to be presented by or on behalf of the Minister at any review under subsection (2) or (2.1) of the detention of a person referred to in subsection (4.1) should not be disclosed on the grounds that its disclosure would be injurious to national security or to the safety of persons, and

(b) a request therefore is made by the Minister, the adjudicator shall order that the review or any part thereof be conducted in the absence of the person and any counsel representing the person.

(4.3) Any person excluded by any order under subsection (4.2) from the whole or any part of the review under subsection (2) or (2.1) may apply to the Chief Justice of the Federal Court or to a judge of that Court designated by the Chief Justice for the purposes of this subsection to have the order quashed and sections 36.1 and 36.2 of the Canada Evidence Act shall apply, with such modifications as the circumstances may require, to such applications.

(4.4) Unless quashed, an order under subsection (4.2) shall, with respect to the person to whom the order relates, apply to every review under subsection (2) or (2.1), or part thereof, at which the Minister is of the opinion that any evidence or information to be presented by or on behalf of the Minister at the review, or part thereof, should not be disclosed on the grounds that its disclosure would be injurious to national security or to the safety of persons.

(5) Where the adjudicator who conducts a review under subsection (2) or (2.1) does not continue a person's detention under subsection (4), the adjudicator shall make the appropriate order under subsection 104(3).

(6) An adjudicator who conducts a review under subsection (3) shall make the appropriate order under subsection 104(3)."

and

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be further amended in Clause 11 by striking out line 2 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"exigent circumstances" means circum-";

and

That the Bill be further amended in Clause 16 by striking out line 16 at page 24 and substituting the following therefor:

"82.1(2), 83(1) and 91.1(1), and any such power,".

ATTEST

Robert Marleau
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this message from the House of Commons is rather lengthy, and honourable senators might wish to have further time to read it rather than deal with it this afternoon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Will the message be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on next Tuesday?

The Hon. the Speaker: I gather that Senator Doody is moving that the message be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I move that the message be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Doody, message placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gerald Eric Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada (Bill C-104, Chapter 2, 1988)

The Honourable Marcel Danis, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988 (Bill C-108, Chapter 3, 1988).

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTY-SECOND REPORT (revised)

Your Committee has examined and approved the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1988-89 and recommends their adoption.

A copy of the said Estimates accompanies this report (Sessional Paper No. 332-682).

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think an explanation is required, because we are asking the Senate to adopt the overall estimates of the Senate for the fiscal year 1988-89. Obviously, that is not something we would ask the Senate to do on the spot, late on a Thursday afternoon, if there were not some background provided. I shall, however, be brief.

What has happened is this: The Internal Economy Committee has studied for some time, both the committee itself and through long hours of work undertaken by the Subcommittee on Budgets, the estimates for this year. Eventually the committee presented a report, which is currently on our order paper, but which I will ask leave to withdraw if the Senate is prepared to adopt this revised report.

Upon examination of those estimates presented by the committee, the government requested of the Internal Economy Committee, and particularly the subcommittee, possible adjustments and revisions to those estimates to provide for an increase, as is shown here, of 9.77 per cent over last year's estimates and 5.1 per cent over last year's actual and forecast expenditures—"last year" meaning the fiscal year 1987-88. After considerable and very inventive work, done by the staff, the Internal Economy Committee and the Subcommittee on Budgets, was completed, as late as today, these revised estimates were prepared.

What I am presenting to honourable senators now is the result of the work done by the government, by the staff in consultation with Treasury Board, and by the Subcommittee on Budgets. This morning the main committee authorized the subcommittee to work with the staff to prepare these revisions to the estimates. Therefore, it appears unnecessary to have a report back from the subcommittee to the main committee. For that reason I am presenting these revised estimates at this late stage. I ask honourable senators to take into account that this is not something suddenly presented but something which has been the subject of a great deal of study, both in its original and revised forms.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRTY-SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Consideration of the Thirty-second Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Estimates of the Senate, 1988-89), tabled in the Senate on 17th December, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I have leave to withdraw Order No. 9, standing in my name, which is the motion for consideration of the thirty-second report of the Internal Economy Committee? That previous report dealt with the unrevised estimates, those which were the subject matter of the revised report just adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 9, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 9, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I may have given a wrong impression the other day when I was speaking about wanting to move to the other side of the house. This simply has to do with my views on free trade. I would not want anyone to mistake me for being a proponent of free trade, should they have left the gallery and not have heard me talk.

My comments were in no way intended to mean that I have anything personal against any of my Tory colleagues close to whom I am sitting. They are people I like a lot. If any of them should agree to serve as a trustee looking after the inheritance of my children, I would have full confidence that they would manage it honestly, and if anything went wrong with the investment I would assume it was an error of judgment and not venality.

I suspect no Tory in this house of not being a patriot. I just mistrust their judgment when it comes to free trade.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I want to raise a question of privilege, and it concerns Senator Gigantès. His speech just now reminded me this is the first time I have been in this chamber since the event leading to my question of privilege occurred. In other words, this is my first chance to advise the Senate of a statement made by Senator Gigantès. You will be the judge whether privilege is indeed involved here.

In any event, I can assure you the people of Edmundston and probably most of the population of the Atlantic Region are shocked and appalled, and I imagine they resent Senator Gigantès because he decided to show his contempt for the people of Edmundston on a CBC television program.

On that occasion, Senator Gigantès, posing as chairman of his own one-man committee, as usual, asked the interviewer to explain why it was difficult and in fact unrealistic to even consider retraining workers in the Maritimes. After putting this question to the interviewer, he asked her the following leading question: "Would you move to Edmundston, knowing that they do not have all the required facilities?" Senator Gigantès repeated this question twice during the same interview—I have it on tape—and at the time he saw Halifax as the only place in the Maritimes where people could go to be trained and get jobs.

I think this is absolutely outrageous. I want to ask Senator Gigantès to retract and apologize to the people of the Atlantic provinces and especially those of Edmundston whom I have had the honour of representing for fifteen years in the New Brunswick Legislature and I continue to represent today in the Senate.

I can inform you that the capital of the Republic of Madawaska, the city of Edmundston, is a good place to live and that I am proud to represent the people of Edmundston here in the Senate.

I hope Senator Gigantès will apologize to representatives of New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces, and especially to the people of Edmundston.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, if I have inadvertently hurt the feelings of the people of the great province of New Brunswick and the province of Nova Scotia, I would like to give my colleague, Senator Simard, my assurances that it was due to an unfortunate turn of phrase on my part. I was trying to illustrate the problems of disparity in development and the tendency people sometimes have to leave, and so forth.

If I did not get my meaning across and hurt someone's feelings, I must say I am very sorry. I would ask Senator Simard to transmit my apologies to the people of the Republic of Madawaska, to Edmundston, the capital, and to all his friends in Halifax.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 9, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-91, An Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, January 27, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR TREMBLAY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time, honourable senators?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CUSTOMS ORDERS VALIDATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Ian Sinclair, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 9, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-96, An Act to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 28th January, 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TAX REFORM

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF REPORT— NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, February 10, 1988, I will move:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, 26th May 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized to study tax reform in Canada, be empowered to present its report no later than Wednesday, 21st December 1988.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ABORTION

EQUAL ACCESS IN PROVINCES—DECISION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA RE FUNDING

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. The minister is aware that on January 28 the Supreme Court of Canada made a decision on the question of the constitutional right of Canadian women to have equal access to abortion.

In part, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada found that the existing laws were unconstitutional in that they denied Canadian women equal access to abortion all across Canada.

Can the minister advise us whether the federal government intends to hold consultations with the provinces to ensure that the dictum of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to equal access will result in reasonably consistent approaches by the various provinces to this question of access to abortion?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, a meeting of officials in the justice field from the federal government and the provinces will be held very shortly, and the provincial attorneys general and the federal Minister of Justice will be meeting in mid-March on this matter so far as it relates to the striking down of section 251 of the Criminal Code by the Supreme Court decision.

Meanwhile, the Honourable Jake Epp, Minister of National Health and Welfare, is in touch with his counterparts in the provinces to discuss the manner in which the provinces will carry out their responsibilities in the field of health in light of the Supreme Court decision.

Senator Austin: I thank the minister for his answer, and I congratulate the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, on a statement made to the Ontario branch of the Canadian Bar Association on Thursday, February 4 last, in which he said that the federal cabinet wants "the widest possible consultation" with the provinces to "bring Canadians together to try to develop consistent approaches" to any future position on abortion.

While that is commendable, I wonder whether the minister could give us the view of the government with respect to the decision of the Province of British Columbia to remove all funding for abortions performed in the province of British Columbia, except where there exists an immediate life-threatening situation. I wonder whether the federal government has a policy view with respect to that action.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there have been at least three statements made by government authorities in the province of British Columbia, the most recent being that which Senator Austin has cited on the part of the Premier of British Columbia. It is precisely to discuss those matters that Mr. Epp is entering into consultations with his counterparts in the provinces.

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform this house of the federal government's views on the rights of the unborn?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the honourable senator will be aware that in several of the judgments written by members of the Supreme Court in ruling on section 251 of the Criminal Code Parliament was invited to consider legislation having to do with when the rights of the fetus come into play. This, of course, is a matter that we are considering.

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a further question. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether the government will bring forth an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, before the next election, relating to the rights of the unborn?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as a result of the Supreme Court decision of January 28, a legal void has been created. Canada is perhaps the only western industrialized country, at the moment, that does not have a law governing abortion. Therefore, it seems obvious to us that at least within our area of jurisdiction we will have to move to fill that legislative void, and that we should discuss, this being a federation, with the provinces the exercise of their responsibilities as well. Insofar as the first part of my proposition is concerned—that is to say, filling the legislative void—we are now considering the legislative options within our jurisdiction.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers. I would like to follow the format that seems to have become accepted in this place. I shall read the name of the senator who asked the question, the date on which the question was asked, identify the question, and ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings, if the Senate does not require me to read it.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICES REVIEW BOARD—COMING INTO FORCE OF POWERS—DRUG PRICE INCREASES—BASIS OF STATISTICS—REQUESTS RE DRUG PRICING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers in reply to three questions asked by Senator Sinclair on January 26 regarding the Drug Prices Review Board—Coming into Force of Powers—Drug Price Increases—Basis of Statistics—Requests Re Drug Pricing

Drug Prices Review Board—Coming Into Force of Powers

The section giving the Board its powers was proclaimed by the Governor in Council on December 7, 1987. However, the rules and regulations surrounding the obligatory provision of information to the Board and the mechanics for the issuing of the Board's orders have not yet been gazetted. Once they have gone through the public consultation process the Board will have a uniform and efficient mechanism to assess whether or not the price at any time is or is not excessive. The Board is already monitoring prices in this regard.

Drug Price Increase—Basis of Statistics

The numbers quoted by Senator Murray were based on Statistics Canada published data.

The Drug Price Index referred to by the honourable senator was the Consumer Price Index for Prescription Medicines. That means that it includes drugs that are subject to generic competition.

Requests Re Drug Pricing

There have been a number of concerns expressed by some citizens regarding the increase of particular drugs. However, to the best of the government's knowledge there have been no representations from such organizations regarding the movement of prices since the Board has been proclaimed.

ROLE OF DRUG PRICES REVIEW BOARD—ROLLBACK OF PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION—GENERIC DRUGS—REMOVAL FROM SALE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers in response to questions raised in the Senate on January 26 last by Senator Buckwold regarding Role of Drug Prices Review Board—Rollback of Prices—Government Action—Generic Drugs—Removal from Sale.

Role of Drug Prices Review Board—Rollback of Prices—Government Action

The Board can examine prices for all patented drugs whether they are newly introduced or have been on the market for some time. The statute gives the Board the power to look at all patented drug prices.

The statute contemplates the Board examining newly introduced drugs by providing two tiers of criteria by which excessive pricing can be assessed. For drugs that have been on the market for some time they can look at prices for the past five years and the rate of change of the CPI. If, as in the case of new drugs, this information is not available, the Board can look at the cost of making and marketing the medicine or any other factor to determine whether or not the price is excessive.

If the Board finds that a drug's price is excessive it can remove the exclusivity on that drug and on one other. Therefore, if the removal of exclusivity on that drug would not be sufficient as a penalty, then the Board can look at any other patented drug sold by the company in question.

The government will not interfere with the statutory operation of the instrument of price monitoring and protection that Parliament has established.

The Board, once it is operational, will be able to examine each and every price increase that has taken place to determine whether the price of any drug is or is not "excessive" at the time the Board examines it. The determination of excessive pricing is at a point in time, whether or not the price has risen recently or not. Keep in mind that the Board can consider prices over a five-year period and past increases may make a current price excessive.

The Board will examine the prices of drugs in Ontario once it is operational to determine whether or not, on a case by case basis, to roll back prices.

Generic Drugs—Removal From Sale

No generic that was on the market on June 27, 1986, has to be removed. All generics on the market as of June 27, 1986, stay on the market. The Board will be able to look at price increases that occurred before it became fully operational in determining whether or not the price level at the time of its examination is excessive.

ROLE OF DRUG PRICES REVIEW BOARD—ROLLBACK OF PRICES— GOVERNMENT ACTION—DRUG PRICE INCREASES— COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers in response to two questions raised in the Senate on January 26 last by Senator Thériault regarding Role of Drug Price Review Board—Rollback of Prices—Government Action—Drug Price Increases—Compensation to Provinces.

Role of Drug Prices Review Board—Rollback of Prices—Government Action

Subsection 41.15(2) gives the Board the power to reduce prices or to remove exclusivity from the drug in question and any one other drug.

Section 41.24 also requires the Board to report to Parliament annually on pricing trends and to name those patentees of whom it has requested cost information for having exceeded the CPI in its price increases under Sections 41.15(1.1) and 41.16(5.1). This public record of price performance will be a major source of pressure on drug companies.

Drug Prices Increases—Compensation to Provinces

The provisions of Bill C-22 dealing with the transfer of some $100 million to the provinces was made "for the purpose of research and development." There is no reason to increase the money to the provinces at this time.

The provinces are the largest purchasers of medicines and are therefore in a position to negotiate with the drug companies for good prices. This and the Board's mandate will provide adequate measures to protect provincial and other consumer interests.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION FROM PMAC OR MULTINATIONAL DRUG COMPANIES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the response to a question raised in the Senate on January 26 last by Senator Haidasz regarding Drug Price Increases—Possible Government Request for Explanation from PMAC or Multinational Drug Companies.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has communicated with the drug companies to remind them of their obligations to keep prices from being excessive and to meet their commitments relating to research and development.

It is the responsibility of the Board as an independent review body to examine the prices of drugs; they have undertaken this task and will be fulfilling this responsibility.

DATE OF RESTRICTION OF DRUG PRICE INCREASES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 26 last by Senator Stewart regarding Date of Restriction of Drug Price Increases.

The government does not like to give regulators retroactive powers as implied in the question. Generics have not been removed since June 27, 1986. The Board's powers and the periods of exclusivity both commenced at the same time, November 19, 1987, and any suspension of compulsory licenses due to periods of exclusivity if they apply, apply only since that date.

The Board will be able to look at price levels extant once it is operational and decide whether or not they are excessive as a result of the increase in prices that has taken place since 1986 or even before.

DRUG PRICE INCREASES—ROLLBACK POWERS OF MINISTER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 26 last by Senator Grafstein regarding Drug Price Increases—Rollback Powers of Minister.

(The answer follows:)

The new Competition Act provides for criminal penalties if competitors enter agreements that would lessen competition unduly. If the honourable senator has any evidence that the executives of those companies have agreed to raise prices then he should bring that information to the attention of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Competition Act.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a Message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to Bill C-84, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to make some comments relating to the message and to the bill. I must say at the outset that my comments are mine and that they emanate largely out of my experiences with the Committee on Terrorism I chaired last spring and summer. The official response to the message from this side is not my job to perform.

• (1420)

I have watched the debate on Bill C-84 unfold both in this chamber and in the other place. Much of what I have heard concerns me a great deal and has motivated me to wade into this very complex and contentious area. I may well regret doing so and, in fact, it may be too late. However, I want to try to refocus the debate by discussing what the bill is truly about, in my opinion.

Honourable senators, Bill C-84, in my opinion, is not an anti-refugee bill, although it may be convenient for some to portray it as such; neither is it, in my opinion, a racist bill, but, again, it may be convenient for some to portray it in that fashion. It is not an anti-humanitarian bill; it is not aimed at innocent church groups or individuals acting in a strictly humanitarian fashion. Quite frankly, I do not find the bill itself to be particularly draconian, in light of the challenges it is intended to meet. In the simplest possible terms, what Bill C-84 is about is the safety and security of Canada and Canadians. Its focus is not on refugees or immigrants wishing to come to Canada but is on criminal or terrorist elements who try to avoid being brought to justice by misusing or abusing the Canadian refugee determination process. The purpose of Bill C-84 is to allow officials to increase their ability to identify, detain or deport security risks who try to enter Canada.

As I mentioned before, for a good portion of this past year I served as chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety. What I heard while serving in that capacity worried me a great deal. I heard how a number of people who were implicated in criminal or terrorist incidents elsewhere in the world came to Canada, claimed refugee status, and abused our complex and dilatory refugee determination process in order to avoid or delay deportation and to avoid or delay being brought to justice. The description of the system and how it can be misused and abused in this fashion is set out in our committee report, and I do commend it to your attention.

Honourable senators, let me be clear: These are not refugees fleeing the oppression of totalitarian right or left-wing regimes in developing countries; these are terrorists or criminals, many of whom have been implicated in incidents in Italy, Germany, the United States, France or elsewhere. Many of these people are still here. Some have been here for five, six or seven years. They are free to move about as they choose within the country. We are all familiar—courtesy of the Globe and Mail—with the recent story of Mahmoud Muhammad Issa Muhammad. This is an individual who was—or is—a member of the PLO, and who was sentenced by a Greek court for his role in the attack on an El Al jetliner. He now resides in Brantford, Ontario, and has just claimed refugee status.

There are a number of other cases that have not received the same level of publicity. Let me give you some examples: Take, for example, the case of Francisco Piperno, who was convicted by the Italian courts of terrorist activities that he undertook or promoted as a member of the Red Brigades. Some of these activities related directly to the assassination of the Italian Prime Minister, Aldo Moro. Piperno fled to Canada to escape incarceration and claimed refugee status here. Even though his request for refugee status was denied in 1983, he stayed in Canada, apparently unrepentant, until he returned recently to Italy to seek an amnesty.

Another example is illustrated by an article in the Toronto Star of Saturday, November 21, 1987. This article concerned two West Germans, who claimed they were on a "spying" mission to identify weaknesses in our immigration system. They were caught and convicted of theft, abduction and possession of dangerous weapons.

A third example is far more serious and has, to date, been given little or no publicity. Last year an individual applied for a Canadian visa at our London mission. His application was denied on security grounds. He was identified as a leading figure in the International Sikh Youth Organization. This organization has been implicated in terrorist violence in India and elsewhere in the world. In Canada the ISYO has been directly linked to the attempted assassination of a Punjabi cabinet minister and to other terrorist incidents.

The individual concerned was put on a look-out list. Airlines and Immigration officials were alerted to watch for him. In spite of these precautions, he landed at Pearson International Airport on July 15, 1987, seeking entry as a visitor. He was detained, but, rather than continue in detention and risk deportation, he voluntarily left the country. Had he not left he would still be in Canada today, and probably at large, because current laws would not allow us to detain him longer.

Honourable senators, can you imagine what our allies—especially the Italian, Israeli or Indian governments—must think of our system? In the last case I mentioned there was a man with extremist connections arriving, coincidentally, with the arrival of 174 Sikhs by ship.

This was a few months before the scheduled arrival in Canada of Prime Minister Gandhi. All we could do was allow this man to leave the country.

In the Piperno case, can you imagine the consternation of the Government of Canada and members of this house if someone convicted of involvement in the assassination of a Canadian prime minister had been given refuge in an allied country?

These examples, in my opinion, demonstrate our vulnerability, the ineffectiveness of our systems and procedures, the loopholes that the bill and the message is designed to close.

Let me take you sequentially through a set of conclusions reached by the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety. First, terrorism in Canada is quantitatively and qualitatively different from terrorism in most other countries, including the United States. Second, the principal threat to Canada is from international terrorists, terrorism motivated by history, issues and hatreds originating in another country. The ultimate focus of such terrorism is the institutions, symbols and policies of the government and people of that other country. When those institutions or government representatives are in Canada, we are bound under international law to protect them. Furthermore, Canadians and Canadian institutions may, and have been, caught in the cross-fire.

Let me give you some examples. Although it was a symbol of India that was the target, 329 people, most of them Canadians, perished on Air India Flight 182, apparently victims of terrorism arising out of the Indian-Sikh dispute.

Although it was the Turkish Embassy and Turkish diplomats who were the targets, it was a Canadian security guard—a university student—who was killed in the siege of the Turkish Embassy in 1985 by Armenian terrorists.

So our particular brand of terrorism focusses on the symbols and institutions of other governments in Canada—on foreign diplomats, on foreign diplomatic establishments, on foreign airlines, travel offices, and so on—and comes from those who wish to use Canada as a base or safe haven from which to mount their terrorist violence against other countries, or as a place of respite from the travails of terrorism, a sort of terrorists' R&R.

I believe that these conclusions are generally supported by our security, intelligence and law enforcement agencies. If you accept them, logic would also compel you to accept the duty of our government to be particularly vigilant against those who perpetrate such terrorism.

My point is that we can be as vigilant as we like. Our current refugee-determination process and general immigration system make us vulnerable to the entry of such terrorists. Bill C-84 tries to reduce our vulnerability.

Let me give you some examples of the parts of the system that make us vulnerable. Let us say that a visitor to Canada is identified on his arrival as a known criminal or terrorist by the authorities. As the authorities move to deport him, he claims refugee status. He is thus able to remain in Canada for however long it takes—perhaps years—for the process to exhaust all avenues of appeal and to reach a conclusion.

Let us say that a visitor arrives in Canada with no documentation—none whatsoever. During the time the authorities seek to validate his identity—which in many cases can take months—he is probably free to travel about as he wishes.

Some say that in many of these cases we can currently detain a person who appears to be a real risk until his status is established.

The committee report on terrorism refers to an IRA member who came to Canada and was apprehended. The immigration adjudicator overruled evidence from police and security agencies suggesting that the individual should be detained. He moved freely in Canada until he removed himself voluntarily, before the scheduled date for his inquiry.

Furthermore, although detention can be one solution, it entails real risks. The more frequently we detain terrorists, the more Canada will become a focus of terrorist attention and terrorist reprisals.

Some say that we should put additional resources into checking entrants at airport and border points. This, too, is a partial solution. No matter how good we become at identifying security threats as they enter the country, our refugee-determination system may still let them enter and reside in the country for a considerable period of time.

Can anyone say this is a system designed to meet our international obligations? I think not. Can anyone say that this is a system designed to protect the safety and security of Canadians? Again, I think not.

Although Canada has not been a focus of terrorist attention worldwide, as other countries tighten up their immigration, surveillance and anti-terrorist policies, systems and procedures, as targets harden worldwide, Canada is being left behind. If we do not keep pace, Canada could increasingly become a haven for terrorists, a venue for mounting terrorist attacks, or even a target of terrorist attacks.

● (1430)

Other “friendly” governments have already expressed their increasing concern about Canada in this regard. I contend that there is no duty for government greater than to protect the safety and security of its citizens.

In Canada we have to recognize that we are part of a large continent and that we live next to a nation whose power and prominence in the world have made it the focus of terrorist attack from many quarters. We have to realize that we provide part of a North American defence system against terrorism and that our vulnerability can translate into a vulnerability for our neighbours and allies.

We have to realize that our world is changing. The current Immigration Act was prepared more than a decade ago during a much more innocent time, before terrorism as we know it today had touched us. Our current refugee policy was primarily based on Canada choosing refugees from internment camps around the world and bringing them to Canada. Even a decade ago, no one foresaw or contemplated the vast number of people who would present themselves at Canadian ports of entry and claim refugee status. It is only reasonable and responsible, therefore, that our legislation, our systems and our procedures change with the times.

Honourable senators, we have to strike a balance: a balance between the safety and security of Canada and Canadians and Canada’s moral and legal obligations to provide refuge to those fleeing harassment, torture or death because of their race, political beliefs, religion or colour.

That balance will not be achieved as long as we focus exclusively on just one side of the equation. We fail as legislators if we do not consider and represent this legislation in its full context.

Honourable senators, there have been a lot of bogus arguments raised about Bill C-84; arguments designed to deflect attention from the real issues and concerns behind that bill.

For example, there is an article in the December 21, 1987, Globe and Mail, by a Mr. Waldmen, that contends that Bill C-84 will result in genuine refugees being deported without a hearing and sent to countries with no guarantee of their future safety. In fact, all the government has said it would do is to deport persons to third countries; but only to countries that have the same procedural and substantive protections as Canada.

We have heard a great deal about the plight of refugees arriving without proper documentation, and how Bill C-84 would disadvantage them or discriminate against them. A direct association has been drawn between refugees and people without documents—that one means the other.

The association is wrong and misleading; 80 per cent of the people who present themselves at a Canadian port of entry and claim refugee status have come not from the country of persecution but from a second “safe” country. They therefore have had the opportunity to present themselves at a Canadian mission in that country and arrange properly for refugee status.

The people coming to Canada without proper documentation, in the main, therefore, are those who have chosen not to follow the process, or who have been rejected by the process.

Most of the people who claim refugee status come from countries that require all adults to carry identity cards. Yet many “refugees” from these countries do not carry such cards when they enter Canada. Why? Should not the system be suspicious of such people, and should not the system have the ability to detain them until identity is verified?

Of the total number of people who arrive in Canada and claim refugee status 40 per cent have no documentation whatever—not even their airline tickets to show a name or travel itinerary. Obviously these people have gone to great lengths to conceal their identity. Why? Should the system not be able to detain such people until origin and identity are established?

I am concerned that if we do not improve the effectiveness of our refugee determination process we will have—sooner or later—a major terrorist incident that will clearly demonstrate our vulnerability and the source of that vulnerability. I am concerned that the government and the public will then overreact and impose draconian controls that will, in effect, close our borders to legitimate refugees.

Honourable senators, let me close by emphasizing three basic points:

First, our immigration legislation, systems and procedures are outdated. Let us revise them with attention both to the needs of legitimate refugees and the safety and security of Canada.

Second, let us make the revisions with calm deliberation, understanding the total context in which the revisions are proposed and the very dangerous world in which we find ourselves. Bill C-84 is at least as much about safety and security as it is about refugees and immigrants.

Third, Bill C-84 is about:

Fining or jailing those who misuse the system by smuggling in people who are “inadmissible” under the law. I emphasize that these are, in the main, illegal entrants from Europe, not fugitives from persecution;

Giving authorities the power to detain those who arrive in Canada with no documentation until their identity can be verified;

Giving authorities the power to detain those who are suspected of constituting security threats and, more importantly, giving authorities the power to remove them before Canadians at home and abroad are jeopardized.

All of these changes will incur some inconvenience for legitimate refugees. I contend, however, that the benefits of the added security far outweigh the disadvantages of such inconvenience.

In making these changes we are not breaking new ground. We are following precedents already in place in other countries. As honourable senators know, in response to a number of terrorist atrocities, France now requires visas for everyone who wishes to enter that country.

Australia, the United States and the United Kingdom have also tightened their immigration and entry procedures. In Australia, for example, a “legal fiction” has been devised whereby one is not considered to have entered the country until one’s identity is verified and status approved.

We have not suggested going that far, because we searched for a balance between the safety and security of Canadians and recognizing the plight of legitimate refugees.

Other countries have recognized this threat and have taken remedial action. I do not believe we should be so naive or so blissfully unaware of the risks that face us that we are, in effect, willing to put our citizens at risk without even giving them the opportunity to express their views on the subject.

Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity to make these rather general remarks, but I felt it was important to discuss the issue at this time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the debate on Bill C-84 is bound to be enriched by a contribution from the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety, but I must say for the record that I believe that, essentially, Senator Kelly’s observations represent, to a considerable extent, an oversimplification of the issues that the Senate and others in the country have felt were at play with Bill C-84.

I heard some detail, but I did not hear him enunciate any principles that had not been the subject of debate in Parliament and consideration in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which made a report to the Senate after quite intensive study. That report was adopted by the Senate and was the basis for the amendments that were sent to the other place, and, in turn, those recommendations are the basis for the message that we have now received, setting out the House of Commons’ reaction to the Senate’s suggestions.

The three basic principles that Senator Kelly announced as guidelines for our consideration of this message—the most recent development on Bill C-84—were that our immigration laws, particularly as they deal with refugees, are outdated. I know that that principle was taken into consideration by the Senate and its committee. He also asked that we approach the question calmly. I do not think our committee or the Senate approached the question with any hysteria. In fact, if there was any hysteria in any quarter about this bill, it was the hysterical way the government brought it in during the summer as emergency legislation.

His other principle, the need to prevent abuse, was also the subject of consideration by the Senate and its committee. He feels that the questions of human rights, in some of its aspects at least, are outweighed by, as I heard him say, “the added security.” All that does is beg the question by restating the problem. The problem that the Senate and the committee was considering essentially was simply that, namely, how do we balance the real needs and concerns for security brought by Senator Kelly from his background of expertise—which I do not denigrate in any way—with democratic civil rights. So he has brought forward concerns about needed security, but he must realize that those were not overlooked, and that the Senate committee tried to balance those against the need for fairness, respect for human rights, and an adherence to our international obligations when we subscribe to the United Nations declaration on this subject.

I am glad that Senator Kelly has spoken out on this question from the background of his experience and expertise as chairman of our special committee. I know that if this message is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further consideration, as I think it should be, the committee will take into account Senator Kelly's comments. I have no doubt he will be interested in discussing and elaborating on them before the committee. I hope he will be prepared to do so, because I believe that most of the points he raised have already been considered by that committee. Again, I thank him for his intervention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Nurgitz, debated adjourned.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I point out the presence in the visitors' gallery of one of our former members, Senator John M. Godfrey, who has probably come back to listen to further words of wisdom.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS)—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-12, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Qualifications of Senators).—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke with Senator Marchand, the sponsor of this bill, a little while ago and told him that I had no desire or intention to try to slow up the progress of this bill.

As I see it, and as many of my colleagues, at least on this side, see it, the problem with this particular amendment to the Constitution Act does not relate to the amendment itself but, rather, to the size of the amendment in terms of the hoped-for general reform of the Senate, which we are told is soon to be considered at the First Ministers' meeting.

I am afraid that the Canadian public generally might consider this to be an answer to Senate reform, and I believe that Senate reform encompasses a great deal more than this one item, important though it is.

I fully understand and sympathize with Senator Marchand's concern for this matter. There is no reason I can think of that a qualification or, indeed, any part of the Constitution should so obviously discriminate against any group of Canadians.

Having said that, I would have to return to my contention that I think it more important that we deal with Senate reform as a whole rather than perhaps nibbling at it with one small amendment here and another small amendment there, as is demonstrated by another order on our order paper relative to the attendance of senators.

Those are the concerns I have about this bill. Having said that, I will take my seat and trust that others will look at this particular amendment in that light. It is to be hoped that we will move on toward real, lasting and meaningful Senate reform in the full sense of the word.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

CONSIDERATION OF FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries entitled: "The Marketing of Fish in Canada" (Interim Report II), tabled in the Senate on 9th December, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order, which deals with the fifth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries regarding the marketing of fish, stands in my name. I stood the debate in my name in anticipation of someone wishing to speak on this item.

If no one else wishes to speak, I would ask that the debate be considered concluded. I have no intention of speaking on it myself at this time.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I spoke on the consideration of this report, and I believe Senator Perrault responded. Then, I believe, the Speaker indicated that the debate was concluded. I would suggest that the record will indicate that the order was considered debated.

Senator Doody: Whether the order had been considered debated or not, if it is the pleasure of the Senate, I think the matter should now be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this report is considered debated.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONFERENCE, BANGKOK, THAILAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose, pursuant to notice of January 27, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-eighth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, held in Bangkok, Thailand from 12th to 17th October, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, I gave notice that I would call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-eighth Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference which took place in Bangkok, Thailand, from October 12 to 17, 1987.

Since the Senate is not sitting in Committee of the Whole this afternoon, I thought I would deliver my rather short speech now.

The fall session of the IPU was held in Bangkok from October 12 to 17, 1987. On the agenda was the Iran-Iraq question. Senator Marchand, Senator Phillips and Mr. Marcel Prud'homme, MP, attended the meetings of the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament. The draft text of this resolution was unanimously adopted in the plenary session.

The second item on the agenda was the refugee question, which was submitted for the agenda during the meeting in Nicaragua by Canada. Mr. Don Ravis, MP, and Mr. Svend Robinson, MP, represented Canada on the Committee on Parliamentary, Judicial and Human Rights. The draft resolution was adopted unanimously, both in committee and in the plenary session.

The third item on the agenda was decolonization and apartheid. Madame Suzanne Duplessis, MP, spoke in the plenary session, and Senators Phillips and Marchand, Mr. Don Ravis, MP, and Mr. Svend Robinson, MP, represented Canada on the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories and Ethnic Questions. In the plenary session there were three amendments proposed; the Canadian group cast its 12 votes as follows: yeas, 1; nays, 3; abstentions, 8.

● (1450)

The fourth item on the agenda was on the "current world situation." Mr. Benno Friesen, MP, and I participated in this debate.

Senator Neiman represented Canada on the Special Committee on Human Rights of Parliamentarians. The committee submitted eight resolutions on 52 cases for the conference to consider, and noted that 13 former Chilean parliamentarians had been able to exercise their right to return to Chile and six former Vietnamese parliamentarians were released in September 1987.

There was also a meeting held of the "European Groups and those of Canada and the United States," where discussion took place for an international television hook-up to permit an exchange of views among parliamentarians from East and West by satellite.

A special ad hoc committee was set up to discuss the health and well-being of the elderly. This was chaired by Congressman Claude Pepper from Miami, the topic being the "role of parliamentarians in facing the social and economic implications of the change in demographics regarding aging." It was agreed by the executive that this be continued as an ad hoc committee for the next meeting in Guatemala.

The next meeting should be held in Guatemala City in April 1988. Canada proposed a topic on the environment, which was accepted unanimously by the Inter-Parliamentary Union in Bangkok.

Honourable senators, rather than read into the record more information about the meetings in Bangkok I would like to table in both official languages a report that I ask to be printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "C", p. 2672.)

Senator Bonnell: I also ask that the text of the speech I made concerning AIDS, which I also table, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of speech, see Appendix "D", p. 2721.)

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in case Senator Phillips wants to adjourn the debate, I will tell him that I have concluded my remarks.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, it would be presumptuous of me to think that I could improve on Senator Bonnell's remarks.

Senator Frith: That's a good point!

CHILD CARE

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONTINUE STUDY OF FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE ON CHILD CARE ENTITLED "SHARING THE RESPONSIBILITY" AND FEDERAL RESPONSE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, for Hon. Mira Spivak, pursuant to notice of May 5, 1987, moved:

That, notwithstanding its order of reference of 5th May, 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the examination of the Final Report of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Child Care, entitled: "Sharing the Responsibility";

That the Committee be further authorized to examine the Federal Response to the said Final Report in which is outlined the National Strategy on Child Care; and

That the Committee present its Report no later than June 30, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, in the name of Senator Spivak who unfortunately cannot be here today I seek leave to move the motion of which she gave notice last week. This motion did get the approval of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology from which it originates.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What is the nature of the motion?

Senator Tremblay: The purpose of the motion is simply to correct the date of reference to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology with respect to the child care issue.

The date specified at the time was September 30, 1987. We went on with the consideration of this matter without realizing that in a way this was a time limit.

So we want to correct this technical oversight. That is the purpose of the motion of Senator Spivak. I am seeking leave of the Senate to move this motion in her name because she was unable to attend the sitting today, as she had said herself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Mr. Charles Lussier, Clerk of the Senate, and Mrs. Nora Lever, Principal Clerk, House of Commons, participated in the meetings of the Association of Secretaries-General of Parliaments. During the course of the meetings Mr. Lussier was elected President of the Association.

II. PREPARATORY MEETINGS

A. Briefings in Ottawa

Prior to the Conference the Canadian delegation held briefing sessions in Ottawa where it examined the current state of national and international developments affecting the main subject items on the agenda. On 15 September the briefers were: Mr. Raph Girard, Director, Refugee Determination Task Force, Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission; Mr. Gerry Campbell, Deputy Director, Refugee Policy, Department of External Affairs and Mr. Scott Heatherington, Director, Refugee Affairs, Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission. On 16 September, the briefers were: Mr. Nick Etheridge, Director, Political and Strategic Analysis Division,

Department of External Affairs; Mr. Simon Williams, Desk Officer, Indonesia, Department of External Affairs; Mr. Michael Welsh, Deputy Director, South East Asia Division, Department of External Affairs; Mr. Nigel Godfrey, Trade Development (Thailand), Department of External Affairs; Mr. Peter McKellar, Director, Energy and Environment Division, Department of External Affairs; Mr. François Bregha, Director, Northern Programs, Environment Canada and Mr. Phil Paradine, Chief, Environmental Division, Canadian International Development Agency.

Prior to the Conference, the delegation also received a bibliography prepared by Mrs. Lucienne Eshelman of the Library of Parliament as well as a number of background papers prepared by research officers of the Library of Parliament: Mr. Michel Rossignol, Thailand; Mr. Grant Purves, The Process of Decolonization and Ms Margaret Young, Refugees: Some Global Aspects

B. Twelve-Plus Meetings

A meeting of the western and like-minded delegations was held in Bangkok 9 October. Mr. Friesen and Senator Bonnell were our representatives. Further meetings of the Twelve-Plus took place each morning as the Conference proceeded. The Twelve-Plus discussed the following matters: the agenda of the current conference, proposals for the agenda of the 79th Conference, review of the 77th Conference, nominations for members of the Executive Committee and the report of the Working Group on the Implementation of the Union's Resolutions and the Functioning of Conferences.

Mr. Friesen presented the Canadian Group proposal to include an item on the environment in the agenda of the 79th Conference:

The contributions of parliaments:

- in the promotion and implementation of environmental strategies for achieving sustainable development in particular those outlined in the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development

- in the recognition of the importance of sustainable development for developing and developed countries
- in the establishment of national policies, machinery and legislation to attain sustainable development and which integrate environmental objectives into transport, energy, agriculture, forestry, population, health and economic goals and enhance the preservation of the world's natural and cultural heritage
- in the recognition of the global dimension of environmental issues and the urgent necessity of promoting international co-operation including the development of an international legal framework and the implementation of changes in the mandates of U.N. agencies
- in the development of regional structures to resolve transboundary issues and enhance regional cooperation.

After discussion, the Canadian Group agreed to shorten the item to read as follows:

The promotion and development of environmental strategies at national and global levels for achieving sustainable development while enhancing the preservation of the world's natural and cultural heritage.

C. Delegation Meetings in Bangkok

Everyday at 07:30 the delegation met to review the previous days's events, plan the day's work, discuss resolutions and speeches and to be briefed on administrative and policy items.

D. IPU Executive Committee Meetings

The Committee met on 9, 10 and 15 October under the chairmanship of the President of the Inter-Parliamentary Council, Mr. Hans Stercken (Federal Republic of Germany). Mr. Friesen attended, assisted by Mr. Knowles.

The President and the Secretary-General reported on the work of the Union since the 77th Conference in Managua. The Working Group on the Implementation of the Union's Resolutions and the Functioning of Conferences occupied much of the the Secretariat's time. The Working Group's Report and the analysis of follow-up on Conference decisions in Union member countries was discussed in great detail. The Working Group, set up during the 77th Conference, recommended an annual format of one major Conference with all Committees meeting and a Conference consisting of Inter-Parliamentary Council members only. The Council meeting would deal with Union administrative and policy matters and international questions as well. The Executive Committee generally endorsed the Working Group's recommendations for the consideration of the Council, but decided to promote further reflection and discussion and to make its final recommendation at the 79th Conference to take place in Guatemala City in April of next year. The new format would come into effect in 1990.

Preparations are continuing for the Union's centennial in 1989. The leaders of the Hungarian and British Groups, hosts respectively of the 1989 spring and autumn conferences, are planning a number of appropriate events such as a world children's drawing contest and an international television debate. The Union's Secretariat will contract the preparation of a 25 minute documentary film on the Union's past and present. A popular book on Parliaments in the World will be written by Mr. Phillip Laundry, Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons. The Speaker of the House of Commons has authorized Mr. Laundry to work on the book on House of Commons time, thus making a major contribution to the centennial. The Canadian Group has also asked the Canada Post Corporation to issue a commemorative stamp.

The Committee examined and recommended action for the following special conferences and activities:

- Working Group to examine the viability for holding a television debate as requested by the members attending the meeting of the CSCE Country delegations.

- Conference on Health - A Basis for Development in Africa, Brazzaville, Congo, 27 June - 1 July 1988.
- Symposium on Participation by Women in the Political and Parliamentary Decision-Making Process, Geneva, January 1989.
- Consideration for a Conference on World Intellectual Property.
- The request to national groups to report on any steps taken on the 77th Conference (Managua, April/May 1987) Resolution "To establish a Parliamentary Support Committee to actively contribute to the world campaign for the successful holding of the international peace conference on the Middle East"

III. THE INAUGURAL CEREMONY

The opening ceremony of the 78th Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union took place in the Viphavadi Ballroom of the Hyatt Central Plaza Hotel at 4:30 p.m. on 12 October in the presence of His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej. His Excellency Mr. Bhichai Rattakul, Deputy Prime Minister, welcomed the delegates and expressed the hope that the Conference would be successful in promoting understanding between the parliaments of the world. Mr. Hans Stercken, President of the Inter-Parliamentary Council, noted that ordinary people looked to politicians to create conditions in which they could look for a better future. The ending of conflicts throughout the world had to be the dominant topic of this conference if the IPU was to play an important role in the dialogue for peace and reconstruction. But after peace had been achieved there was still the question of international co-operation in dealing with the tens of millions of refugees throughout the world. He concluded by saying that the voice of parliamentarians was a powerful one and they should make it heard so as to fulfill common objectives.

Mr. S.A.M.S. Kibria, Under-Secretary General of the United Nations and Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, read a message from the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Senor Perez de Cuellar, in which he greeted the delegates of the 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference. He said that like the United Nations the IPU reflected peoples' aspirations for peace and justice within a framework of international law. The programme of the Conference properly paid attention to questions of development and human rights and problems of refugees. Global mobilization was necessary if the rights of individuals were to be respected and assistance brought to the needy.

His Excellency, Mr. Ukrit Mongkolnavin, President of the National Assembly of the Kingdom of Thailand and the President of the Thai National Group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, welcomed delegates and said that as parliamentarians committed to promoting world peace and justice, delegates had a special duty to close the gap between talking and doing and to examine the causes of war, in which the sovereignty and integrity of nations were violated. They also had to address the plight of refugees and give urgent consideration to finding appropriate remedies for the problems of the world's poor.

His Majesty the King, Bhumibol Adulyadej, said that it was a great pleasure to welcome the representatives of parliaments from so many countries throughout the world and to preside over the opening ceremony of the 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference. To co-operate in maintaining peace and security was one of the most important duties of countries which wanted to see peoples of all races and religions co-existing and progressing in equal freedom. The Inter-Parliamentary Union was one of several international institutions which had been established to bring about permanent peace and security. For almost a century it had been working to that end. It was meeting in Bangkok in order to address the many problems detrimental to world peace and to study means of promoting freedom and prosperity throughout the world.

IV. INTER-PARLIAMENTARY COUNCIL

The Council, which met at 10:00 a.m. Monday, 12 October, was attended by Mr. Friesen and Senator Bonnell. The council welcomed the National Group of the Philippines for reaffiliation to membership in the Union. Regrettably, the Council had to suspend the membership of the National Group of Burundi.

In his report the Secretary General, Mr. Pierre Cornillon, reported that 108 countries are now represented within the Union. He also reviewed the various activities of the Union since the last Council meeting including follow-up to the recommendations of the previous conference, preparations for the Union's Centennial, meetings of parliamentarians attending the UN General Assembly and the promotion of parliamentary institutions. Mr. Hans Sterchen, President of the Council, reported on the activities of the Executive Committee including its study of the report of the Working Group on Implementation of the Union's Resolutions and the Functioning of Conferences.

Much of the meeting was devoted to consideration of the report of the Working Group. There was a consensus that national groups should make every effort to promote the implementation of the Union's resolutions. The Executive Committee recommended that an evaluation of the follow-up measures taken by the Groups be made every four years instead of the current practice of two years in order to avoid danger that this becomes a routine matter. This was adopted by a vote: yeas - 70, nays - 25. There was extensive debate on the functioning of the Union's conferences. Among the proposals were: one major conference in the fall with a meeting of the Council in the spring, increasing the number of committees from four to five, lengthening the conference from one week to ten days and increasing the size of delegations. After extensive discussion it was agreed that each national group would review the proposals with their own members and would be prepared to discuss these matters at the next IPU Conference. The Council also agreed with the recommendation of the Working Group to limit speaking time to 10 minutes for each delegation on each of the three debates.

The Council continued its deliberations on Saturday 17 October by resuming discussion of the Working Group Report. The Group of the Federal Republic of Germany had submitted a proposal for amending Articles 3, 11 and 19 of the Union's Statutes to provide for greater participation by women in the Union. The Working Group felt that these amendments were not admissible because the amendments would "have the value of recommendations whereas, by nature, statutes enshrine obligations". The Executive Committee had endorsed the report of the Working Group on this point and recommended its acceptance by Council. At the insistence of the Group of the Federal Republic of Germany a vote was taken with the following results: yeas - 75, nays - 25, abstentions - 5.

Article 8 of the Statutes and Rule 42 (2) make it a duty for national groups to promote the implementation of the Union's resolutions and to report on actions taken and results obtained. A detailed report on the activities undertaken by national groups in applying these provisions during 1985, 1986 and 1987 was examined. Unfortunately, less than half of the member Groups comply regularly with this obligation. Only 38 countries including Canada had submitted a report for each of the three years under study. This can be contrasted with twenty years ago when 45 of the 66 member countries filed annual reports.

Elections for the four positions on the Executive Committee were held with the following results -- Mr. Huan Xiang (China) 137 votes; Mr. S. Khunkitti (Thailand) 126 votes; Mrs. M. Molina Rubio (Guatemala) 120 votes; Mr. J. Maciszewski (Poland) 99 votes and Mr. Kabimbi Ngoy (Zaire) 71 votes. Mrs. Rubio is the first woman to be elected to the Executive Committee.

The Council also examined and adopted unanimously the report of the Special Committee on Violations of the Human Rights of Parliamentarians described elsewhere in this report.

The agenda for the 79th Conference was discussed and the Council accepted the proposal by Canada for an item on the environment.

The Council also accepted, on division, the recommendation of the Executive Committee to establish a "Parliamentary Support Committee to contribute actively to the world campaign for the successful holding of the international peace conference on the Middle East".

V. FIRST PLENARY SESSION - ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND SUPPLEMENTARY ITEMS

The first plenary session of the Conference took place on the afternoon of Monday, 12 October, starting at 6:00 p.m. Item 1 on the agenda was the election of the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference. Dr. Ukrit Mongkolnavin was elected President by acclamation and then each delegation nominated one vice-president, Mrs. Duplessis being Canada's choice.

Item 2 was the adoption of an amendment to Article 23.1 and 2 of the Statutes to increase the number of members on the Executive Committee from ten to twelve.

Item 3 was the adoption of an amendment to Rule 23.1 and 2 regarding speaking time for delegations. It was agreed that no more than two representatives of each delegation may speak; every delegation shall be entitled to 10 minutes speaking time; the time may be shared between the two speakers in the most appropriate way.

Item 4 was the consideration of requests for the inclusion of a supplementary item on the Conference agenda, from the following proposals:

1. The contribution of Parliaments to the implementation of UN Security Council resolution 598 (1987) on ending the war and achieving comprehensive and just peace between Iraq and Iran (Iraqi Group)

2. Initiative of Parliaments against drugs and, in particular, in view of the aggravation of the problem, encouragement of action by the international community against organized crime, in favour of crop reconversion, and in support of the activities of the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (Italian Group)
3. Security in the Persian Gulf and the necessity of withdrawal of foreign forces (Group of the Islamic Republic of Iran)
4. The Esquipulas II Agreements: A hope for peace in Central America (Groups of Guatemala and Nicaragua)

Upon the recommendation that the Conference pass a statement of support for the recent initiatives in Central America, namely the Esquipulas II Agreements, the Groups of Guatemala and Nicaragua agreed to withdraw their requests. The Italian Group also agreed to withdraw its request as this subject would be discussed at the forthcoming IPU conference on drug trafficking in November in Caracas.

The Spanish delegation reflecting the consensus of the Twelve Plus Group proposed an amendment to the Iraqi request which is as follows:

Contribution of Parliaments to achieving comprehensive and just peace between Iran and Iraq and to security of navigation in the Gulf on the basis of the implementation of UN Security Council resolution 598 (1987)

Subsequently, the Group of the Islamic Republic of Iran agreed to withdraw its request, but did give an explanation of its position. There being only one request before the Conference, it was included as the supplementary item on the agenda and was referred to the 1st Committee, the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament.

VI PLENARY DEBATES

Mr. Ravis spoke on behalf of Canada in the debate on human rights and refugees. The conference proceedings summarized his intervention as follows:

MR. D. RAVIS (Canada) thanked the Thai Group for their hospitality. He congratulated Thailand too on her hospitality to over a million refugees from Kampuchea. The solution to the problem lay with the parliaments and governments represented at this Conference. The world contained 15 million refugees - "the fourth world" - and their story was as old as the Exodus. In contrast with many other international problems, this one was getting worse. Canada was built by immigrants and refugees, and led the world in helping them. She had taken in 100,000 refugees since 1981, and expected to receive 20,000 more this year. In 1986 she had received the Nansen medal from the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. She offered asylum to all genuine refugees though she would not stand for abuse. But most refugees, though grateful for a new home in the West, would rather return to their own homelands, as was their right. Parliamentarians should press their home countries to "clean up their act". Richer countries should see that their overseas aid reached the poorest people. Many refugees came from member countries of the IPU; he therefore challenged the IPU to put its own house in order. He pledged that Canada would continue to receive refugees, and to confront those governments which betrayed their own citizens.

Mrs. Duplessis spoke on behalf of Canada in the debate on decolonization and elimination of apartheid. The conference proceedings summarized her speech as follows:

MRS. S. DUPLESSIS (Canada) emphasized that peace, justice and equality were principles dear to all those who believed in freedom. The injustice suffered by the black population in South Africa was intolerable. The right to vote was a fundamental right, yet it had been refused to millions of Africans by the Government of Pretoria at the elections held in May 1987. All countries represented at the Conference must strengthen coordination of their struggle against apartheid. It was indispensable to find effective ways of increasing pressure for change. The consensus was widening in that respect: some States had discovered that apartheid was not only morally condemnable, but also disadvantageous for business.

The heads of government of the Commonwealth were meeting in Vancouver and were studying the problem. Since South Africa had left the Commonwealth, the organization had spared no effort to re-establish a democratic regime in South Africa. It had set up a group of seven eminent persons, which had published a report on the problem; three weeks later, South Africa declared the state of emergency. Commonwealth leaders meeting in London in 1986 had all, with the exception of the British representative, adopted a recommendation on 11 economic measures against South Africa. The Prime Minister of Canada had raised the problem of apartheid at the meeting of industrialized countries and they had agreed that, in order to find a peaceful and lasting solution to the current crisis in southern Africa, the apartheid regime should immediately be replaced by a democratic regime. Recently, the second Summit of French speaking countries, held in Quebec, had brought together 40 heads of state who had reaffirmed their strong and resolute condemnation of apartheid - source of violence - as well as their determination to work towards the establishment of a democratic regime.

Apartheid was undoubtedly the source of violence: a study by the University of Pretoria had shown that, since 1985, 100-200 deaths could be attributed to ANC action against 1,000-2,000 to the Government of South Africa. The government of Canada condemned such violence and would do all in its power to end it. As the Prime Minister had stated before the United Nations General Assembly on 23 October 1985, he was ready to impose total sanctions and to terminate relations with South Africa if the latter did not renounce apartheid. Such measures would obviously be more effective if they were implemented by a greater number of countries, but if nothing was done, there was a danger of a blood bath without precedent since the Second World War.

Senator Bonnell spoke on behalf of Canada in the general debate on the current world situation. The conference proceedings summarized his remarks as follows:

MR. L. BONNELL (Canada), as a physician, addressed the social and economic implications of AIDS. AIDS promises to kill more people than the two world wars put together and to have consequences as catastrophic as the Great Plague of the Middle Ages. It worried scientists and frightened the public, and no cure was likely to be found for several years. Progress had been made but much more needed to be done. The number of cases in Canada had reached 1112 in May, of whom 512 were already dead, and was rising fast; the Canadian health service was under strain. Most victims were young - in Canada 45 per cent were in their thirties - and national productivity was therefore threatened. The stage was set for a "pandemic". The problem was international, Governments should educate the public and support research. He called for a special IPU conference like the one on the environment in Nairobi.

VII. COMMITTEES

A. 1st Committee - Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament

The Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament met on 13 October to consider agenda item no. 4:

The Contribution of Parliaments to achieving comprehensive and just peace between Iran and Iraq and to security of navigation in the Gulf on the basis of the implementation of UN Security Council resolution 598 (1987).

Senators Marchand and Phillips and Mr. Prud'homme attended the meeting of this committee. A drafting committee was established which reported back to the Committee on 16 October. Its draft resolution was adopted by consensus. (See Appendix 5 for text of draft resolution).

B. IIInd Committee - Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions

The Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions met on 14 October to consider agenda item no. 5:

The Contribution of Parliaments:

- to the respect, development and promotion of human rights
- to the respect for the fundamental principles, treaties and obligations governing relations among nations in order to solve the problem of refugees and displaced persons.

The Canadian Group was one of twenty groups submitting a draft resolution for consideration by the Committee (See Appendix 1 for text of Canadian resolution). Mr. Ravis and Mr. Robinson represented Canada on this Committee. A drafting committee was established which reported back to the Committee on 16 October. Its draft resolution was adopted unanimously by the Committee. (See Appendix 3 for text of draft resolution.)

C. IVth Committee - Committee on Non-Self Governing Territories and Ethnic Questions

On 15 October the Committee met to discuss agenda Item No. 4:

The contribution of Parliaments to efforts aimed at the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and elimination of apartheid and all forms of racism.

The Canadian Group was one of fourteen groups submitting a draft resolution for consideration by the Committee. (See Appendix 2 for text of Canadian resolution.) Senator Phillips, Senator Marchand, Mr. Ravis and Mr. Robinson represented Canada on this Committee. Canada was one of thirteen countries to serve on the drafting committee. Using the texts submitted by Britain and Zimbabwe as basis working texts, the drafting committee met on 15 and 16 October to prepare a draft resolution for consideration by the Committee on 17 October. Amendments to 3 preambular paragraphs and 12 operative paragraphs were proposed. Only the motion to add the words "according to the principles of self-determination" to operative paragraph 46 was adopted. The entire resolution was adopted by 30 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

VIII. SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE HUMAN RIGHTS OF PARLIAMENTARIANS

Senator Neiman who was elected as a substitute member of this committee in 1979 replaced Mr. Klaus de Vries of the Netherlands during the committee's deliberations from 13 to 15 October. The Special Committee considered the (public or confidential) information forwarded by some National Groups relating to the implementation of the resolutions adopted by the Inter-Parliamentary Council in Managua and on action taken to give effect t confidential decisions. In the two sets of meetings held since the Managua Conference, the Special Committee considered in camera the individual situations of 124 parliamentarians of 16 countries in all regions of the world. The Committee submitted 52 cases from 7 countries to the IPU Council: Chile (3 cases); Columbia (4 cases); Indonesia (1 case); Somalia (7 cases); Swaziland (1 case); Turkey (27 cases); Viet Nam (9 cases). It also submitted 8 resolutions on these cases which were adopted unanimously. The committee reported with satisfaction that 13 former Chilean parliamentarians have been able to exercise their right to return to Chile, that 6 former Vietnamese parliamentarians were released in September 1987 and that these cases subsequently were closed.

IX. MEETING OF DELEGATES FROM STATES PARTICIPATING IN THE CSCE PROCESS

A meeting of delegates from Europe, Canada and the United States took place during the afternoon of 14 October to exchange views on east-west relations and various matters within the context of the CSCE process. Mr. Prud'homme and Mr. Robinson attended, assisted by Mr. Knowles. Mrs. Leni Fischer (Federal Republic of Germany) was elected Chairman. Delegations reported on their contact with groups from the other blocks, Canada mentioning that Czechoslovakian and Soviet Parliamentary delegations have recently visited Canada.

The major part of the meeting was devoted to a discussion of the Soviet proposal for an international television hook-up to permit an exchange of views among Parliamentarians from east and west. The idea was enthusiastically received and supported by all members including Canada. It was agreed that all three baskets of the Helsinki Final Act should be included in the television exchange which should involve representation from the neutral and non-aligned states as well as those from NATO and the Warsaw Pact. It was decided to ask the Executive Committee to set up a Committee including members of each group to study the policy and technical factors involved in setting the television link.

X. MEETING OF WOMEN PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mrs. Duplessis, Mrs. Lever and Mrs. Reynolds attended the meeting of women parliamentarians chaired by Mrs. Supatra Masdit, Member of the Thai Parliament on 11 October. Among the items on the agenda were discussions on ways and means to improve the participation of women parliamentarians in activities of IPU including amendments to the Statutes. The Canadian Group was selected to serve on an ad-hoc committee along with the Republic of Korea, Cameroon, USSR and Sweden, to investigate the possibility of nominating, at the next IPU conference, a woman to serve on the IPU Executive Committee.

The results of questionnaires completed by national groups on measures to promote equal rights and responsibilities for men and women were presented. Delegates agreed with the recommendations of the Working Group to give this report the widest possible distribution. Future assessments will concentrate on the participation of women in the political life and the decision-making process and will be carried out every four years. The next study will be carried out in 1991.

Mrs. Duplessis reported on various initiatives since 1984 to improve the status of women in Canada. Among the items were: the child care task force, the appointment of more women to federal commissions and agencies and the judiciary and employment equity legislation.

The women parliamentarians agreed to ask the IPU Executive to approve a symposium in 1988 or 1989 on "The Participation of Women in the Political and Parliamentary Decision-Making Process". This symposium would take place in Geneva with both male and female legislators in attendance.

XI MEETING ON THE HEALTH AND WELL-BEING OF THE ELDERLY

On Wednesday 14 October, Senators Bonnell, Neiman and Phillips, Mr. Prud'homme and Mr. Ravis attended a meeting of an informal group to consider issues relating to the health and well-being of the elderly. The theme of this meeting which was chaired by Congressman Pepper of the United States was "The role of parliamentarians in facing the social and economic implications of the change in demographics regarding aging". The meeting opened with a few brief remarks by Dr. Thomas Mahoney, a specialist on aging, who pointed out that there are currently 290 million people over age 65 and this group is expected to grow to 410 million by the year 2000. The growth of older populations poses a considerable challenge to public policy. It is an unprecedented social phenomenon which will require new ways of thinking, innovative ideas, and different approaches than hitherto on the part of those charged with finding viable solutions. The delegates discussed how their various countries are responding to this increased longevity. At the conclusion of the meeting delegates decided to report to the Council about their deliberations, to recommend a similar meeting at the next Conference and to investigate the possibility of a special conference on this subject.

XII THE FINAL PLENARY

At the final plenary session on Saturday 17 October, the four successful candidates for the Executive Committee elected by the Council were accepted. The conference then considered the three resolutions drafted by the committees. Mr. Tavernier of France who was rapporteur for agenda item 5 presented the draft resolution on human rights and refugees, which had been unanimously adopted by the Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions (see Appendix 3 for copy of text). The Conference also unanimously adopted this resolution.

Mr. Nuis of the Netherlands who was rapporteur for agenda item 6 presented the draft resolution on decolonization which had been adopted by the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories and Ethnic Questions by 30 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions (see Appendix 4 for copy of text). The Moroccan Group introduced a motion to amend paragraph 26 of the preamble by deleting the reference to "the people of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR)" and replacing it with "Sahrawi people". This motion was defeated with yeas - 222, nay, 323, abstentions - 544. The Canadian Group voted with 12 abstentions. The Indonesian Group introduced a motion to delete paragraph 33 of the preamble and paragraph 46 in the operative section which referred to East Timmor. This motion was defeated with yeas - 171, nays - 515, abstentions - 414. The Canadian Group voted with 11 yeas and 1 nay. The Conference then voted on the resolution as a whole: yeas - 791, nays - 121, abstentions - 207. The Canadian Group cast its votes as follows: yeas - 1, nays - 3, abstentions - 8. Mr. Prud'homme gave a short explanation of his vote of abstention saying that while he wanted to support a resolution condemning South Africa, the draft resolution contained unacceptable language. He urged fellow delegates to show good will and to pursue the objectives of the Union by drafting resolutions which national groups could support.

Mr. Martinez of Spain, who was rapporteur for the supplementary item, presented the draft resolution on the Iran-Iraq conflict which had been adopted by consensus by the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament. (See Appendix 5 for copy of text). The Conference unanimously adopted this resolution.

XIII TOUR OF REFUGEE RESETTLEMENT CAMP

The delegation went to Phanat Nikhom Refugee Resettlement Camp, near Bangkok on 11 October on a visit organized by the Canadian Embassy. On the way to the camp Mr. Cliff Shaw, Canadian chargé d'affaires and Mr. Gardner Wilson, Counsellor and Consul, provided briefing on the current situation in Thailand, aspects of Canada-Thai relations and an overview of the embassy's immigration program which covers the People's Republic of Viet Nam and Laos, as well as Thailand. In fact the embassy's immigration program deals almost exclusively with refugee and family unification problems.

Mr. Alain Théault, Second Secretary (Immigration) provided an overview of the refugee problem in Thailand. Most of the 6 camps are in the north near the Laotian border. Care of the refugees is the responsibility of the United Nations High Commissionare for Refugees while the camps are administered by the Thai Government. Phanat Nikhom is a transit camp mainly for Vietnamese and Kampuchean refugees in the process of being accepted and documented for being sent to third countries, mainly the United States whose processing area takes up a large part of the camp area. All Vietnamese boat arrivals are sent directly to the camp. Mr. Théault explained that Canadian processing procedures have been streamlined but that factors outside of our control such as transport facilities and priority given to other countries' programs slows down processing and transit of Canada bound refugees.

The delegation was welcomed to the camp by the Thai camp commander, Mr. Khan Karan and his senior staff members, Mr. Khan Prapakora Smitt and Mr. Khan Viboon from the Ministry of the Interior. A briefing illustrated with slides was presented. The camp was opened in 1980 and has a maximum capacity of 30,000. Presently there are some 20,000 in camp with 53 per cent from Viet Nam, 9 per cent from Kampuchea and 38 per cent from Laos.

Boat refugees number an average of 700 persons a month. They are confined to Section C, the part of the camp which is most crowded and most lacking in facilities. Some 10,000 residents of this section have yet to be accepted by a resettlement country.

Mr. Leo Glensing, UNHCR representative and a Danish national next welcomed the delegation. He stated the view that Canada is the country doing the most for refugees and mentioned the Nansen Medal. Canada is one of the few countries carrying out "open selection" that is processing refugees who have no family or other connections with Canada.

Mr. Glensing expressed his concern over the practice of Vietnamese families sending away a son believing that refugee status and eventual third country resettlement to be the best chance for the child, who might also be able to send for his family. At the present there are over 700 unaccompanied minors between the ages of 6 and 18 in Phanat Nikhom. The problem is that if the unaccompanied minors are resettled then other parents may be encouraged to send out their children.

A large number of voluntary agencies support and organize care services and activities. These include medical services, language and orientation programs relevant to a receiving country and occupational training. Two organizations prepare refugees who have been accepted for Canada. They are the Mennonite Central Committee and the Quebec Government. The MCC Center operated by Henry and Tina Neufeld, teaches health and family planning, provides orientation in English to Canadian life and seeks to involve Canadian churches in supporting refugees. Mr. Neufeld recounted a number of incidents to illustrate the tragedy of the refugee situation, for example, the case of families otherwise eligible for resettlement except for the medical clearance of one family member. The delegates visited the Quebec government refugee orientation centre directed by Mrs. Thérèse Senechal and met members of the teaching staff who are all refugees.

Respectfully submitted,

(Signed)

Benno Friesen, MP
Leader of the Delegation

CONTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTS:

- TO THE RESPECT, DEVELOPMENT AND PROMOTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS;
- TO THE RESPECT FOR THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES, TREATIES AND OBLIGATIONS GOVERNING RELATIONS AMONG NATIONS IN ORDER TO SOLVE THE PROBLEM OF REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS

Draft resolution presented by the Canadian Group

The 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Gravely concerned about the increasing number of refugees and displaced persons who are in need of protection throughout the world,

Deploing the situations which produce refugees and displaced persons, including persecution, armed conflict and violations of human rights,

Recalling the 1951 Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Protocol thereto,

Aware of violations of the fundamental rights of refugees and displaced persons which threaten their safety and well-being,

Convinced of the need for international burden-sharing to solve the problem of refugees and displaced persons,

Affirming the principle that secure voluntary repatriation is the most desirable and effective solution to the problem of refugees and displaced persons,

Aware of the difficulties faced by host countries in receiving refugees and displaced persons,

Commending States which have admitted large number of refugees and displaced persons despite obvious strains on their own economies,

Also commending the work of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in providing assistance, ensuring the safety and well-being of refugees and searching for lasting solutions,

1. Reaffirms the principle of international solidarity and burden-sharing;
2. Urges all States which have not yet done so to ratify the 1951 Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Protocol thereto;
3. Calls on all signatories to the 1951 Geneva Convention and the 1967 Protocol to respect their obligations;
4. Also calls on all States to support the mandate of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees by providing generous financial support, protecting the safety and well-being of refugees and displaced persons within their territories and working towards lasting solutions for refugees and displaced persons;
5. Urges all States to create conditions to enable refugees and displaced persons to return to their countries of origin with the full and effective guarantee of their fundamental rights;
6. Calls on all States to respect the fundamental principles, treaties and legal obligations governing relations among nations, particularly the peaceful settlement of disputes, the right of peoples to determine their future, without interference and with respect for human rights, in order to reduce situations producing refugees.

CONTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTS TO EFFORTS AIMED AT THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES AND ELIMINATION OF APARTHEID AND ALL FORMS OF RACISM

Draft resolution presented by the Canadian Group

The 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Aware that nineteen non-self-governing territories, with a total population of about three million, remain colonial dependencies,

Supporting the principle of the right of all peoples to self-determination,

Recalling the 1960 United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (resolution 1514-IV) which proclaimed "the necessity of bringing a speedy and unconditional end to colonialism in all its forms and manifestations",

Noting that, in the twenty-seven years since the adoption of the Declaration, more than 75 million people have emerged from dependent status,

Welcoming the exercise of the right of self-determination by peoples formerly under colonial rule,

Aware that almost half the remaining colonial population lives in Namibia,

Recalling the negotiating efforts of the Western Contact Group and the African countries concerned to set out a basis for bringing Namibia to independence,

Recalling resolution 435 (1978) of the United Nations Security Council which stipulates that the Constitution for an independent Namibia is to be drafted by representatives of the Namibian people chosen in a free and fair election,

Rejecting any linkage between the achievement of independence for Namibia and the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, while expressing regrets at the need for the presence of foreign troops in any country,

Critical of South Africa's failure to implement resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council,

Noting that colonial attitudes form the basis for the policy and practice of apartheid,

Condemning the policy and practice of apartheid in South Africa as a gross violation of basic human rights,

Recalling the Commonwealth Accord on southern Africa (Nassau, October 1985) which outlined special measures designed to promote a process of dialogue in South Africa that would, within six months, bring about concrete progress in dismantling apartheid and erecting structures of democracy,

Profoundly disappointed that a new and more widely repressive state of emergency has been imposed and political freedom more rigorously curtailed,

Recalling the Report of the Commonwealth Group of Eminent Persons (EPG) following its mission to South Africa, particularly the "negotiating concept" as a means of helping to begin a dialogue between the Government of South Africa and legitimate black leaders,

Deeply regretting the rejection of the "negotiating concept" by the South African Government,

Recalling the Communiqué of the Commonwealth Heads of Government (London, August 1986) which outlined further measures to impress upon South Africa the need for concrete action,

Further recalling the economic measures adopted by the European Community Council of Ministers in September 1986,

Disappointed with the results of the Whites-only election in South Africa in May 1987 where three million Whites voted to support the continued repression and racial segregation of the 20 million non-voting Blacks,

Recalling the closing remarks at the Venice Economic Summit in June 1987 "that a peaceful and lasting solution can only be found to the present crisis if the apartheid régime is dismantled and replaced by a new form of democratic non-racial government",

Further recalling the resolution adopted by the Francophone Summit in September 1987 on the deplorable situation in South Africa,

Noting that sanctions are one of the few peaceful options open to countries opposing apartheid,

Recognizing that sanctions are visible and tangible proof to the average South African that the world sees this system as repugnant and that they demonstrate to the victims of apartheid that other nations are prepared to do more than just talk,

Supporting the objective of increasing regional economic independence for Front-line States,

Recognizing the contribution of the South African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC) in developing the regional economy and reducing economic dependence on South Africa,

Further recognizing SADCC's commitment to developing alternative transport routes to those which pass through South Africa,

1. Calls on all Governments to respect the principle of the right of all peoples to self-determination by providing them with the opportunity freely to determine their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development;

2. Urges all Governments, Parliaments and international organizations to contribute to the rapid elimination of colonialism;
3. Calls for the cessation of all armed action or other repressive measures directed against dependent peoples;
4. Reaffirms that the only agreed basis for internationally recognized independence for Namibia is UN Security Council Resolution 435;
5. Calls on the Government of South Africa to bring Namibia to independence in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 435;
6. Calls on the Government of South Africa to dismantle apartheid and establish non-racial representative Governments;
7. Urges all Governments to encourage the adoption of a peaceful solution that results in freedom and equality in South Africa;
8. Encourages all Governments to implement effective and sustained measures, including economic sanctions, to build up the pressure for change;
9. Calls on all Governments to provide both moral and tangible support to Front-Line States, thereby helping them to achieve regional economic independence;
10. Urges all Governments which are committing vast resources to aid and development in the region to co-ordinate their efforts so as to increase the impact of their contribution.

CONTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTS:

- TO THE RESPECT, DEVELOPMENT AND PROMOTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS;
- TO THE RESPECT FOR THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES, TREATIES AND OBLIGATIONS GOVERNING RELATIONS AMONG NATIONS IN ORDER TO SOLVE THE PROBLEM OF REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS

Draft resolution unanimously adopted by the Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions

Rapporteur: Mr. Y. Tavernier (France)

A. With regard to the respect, development and promotion of human rights

The 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recognizing that universal respect for and observance of human rights constitute an essential factor in the attainment of peace and security as well as the basis for freedom, justice and well-being, and are indispensable to ensuring the stable development of friendly relations and mutually advantageous co-operation between States,

Conscious of the need to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, in accordance with the aims of the Inter-Parliamentary Union,

Recalling that the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women, and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Mindful that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that all persons are entitled to realization of the civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights which are indispensable to their dignity and the free development of their personality,

Referring to the preambles to the International Covenants on human rights which recognize that the ideal of free human beings enjoying freedom from fear and want can only be achieved if conditions are created whereby everybody may enjoy his or her economic, social and cultural rights, as well as his or her civil and political rights,

Convinced that the full implementation of civil and political rights is inseparably linked to the exercise of economic, social and cultural rights,

Recognizing that the realization of the right to development can promote the exercise of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights,

Reaffirming the inalienable right of all peoples to determine their own form of government and to choose their own economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint of any kind whatsoever, it being accepted that denunciations of violations of international obligations concerning human rights cannot be rejected as interference in the internal affairs of States,

Mindful of the importance of the principles of human rights and fundamental freedoms laid down in the Helsinki Final Act as well as in a number of other regional agreements on human rights,

Aware that the prevention of nuclear and conventional war and the strengthening of international peace and security are prerequisites for the full attainment of fundamental human rights and freedoms,

Noting that human rights form a global, universal and indivisible notion, and that they represent an ideal which no State can claim to have reached,

Concerned, nonetheless, at the violations of human rights occurring in the world and particularly at the cases of mass and flagrant violations of these rights which constitute, in certain cases, a threat to international peace and security,

Expressing regret over the increase in acts of terrorism,

Fully determined to use the weight and prestige of Parliaments in transforming the human rights issue from an object of propaganda polemics into an area of fruitful international co-operation in the general context of seeking solutions to global humanitarian problems,

Desirous of enhancing the contribution of Parliaments to the effective realization of human rights worldwide and thus promoting international humanitarian co-operation, and increasing trust and mutual understanding between States and peoples in the search for a nuclear-free and non-violent world,

Conscious of the significant role that institutions at the national level can play in promoting and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms and in developing and enhancing public awareness of those rights and freedoms,

Reaffirming the importance of public information activities, including education programmes, for the effective promotion and protection of economic, civil, political, social and cultural rights, and the role that non-governmental organizations can play in this regard,

Recognizing the priority which should now be accorded to development or appropriate arrangements at the national level to ensure effective implementation of international human rights standards,

1. Appeals strongly to all States that have not yet become parties to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as other international instruments concerning human rights, to do so, to give these instruments genuine universality;

2. Asks all national Parliaments to ensure that national legislation conforms with these instruments;
3. Urges States which have not already done so, to guarantee protection for fundamental rights and freedoms, including a guarantee of effective remedies in the case of their violation in accordance with their respective constitutional systems and international agreements covering human rights;
4. Appeals to all States to ensure respect and support for human rights and where anyone has been detained for exercising these rights as laid down in the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights, and Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, to release them immediately;
5. Affirms that apartheid, all forms of racial discrimination, colonialism, foreign domination and occupation, aggression and threats against national sovereignty, national unity and territorial integrity, as well as the refusal to recognize the basic right of all peoples to self-determination and the right of all nations to exercise full sovereignty over their natural heritage and resources are situations which in themselves constitute and lead to massive and flagrant violations of all the human rights and fundamental freedoms of peoples and individuals;
6. Reiterates its call for member States to spare no effort in providing for effective legislative and other mechanisms and procedures and adequate resources to ensure more effective implementation of existing international standards relating to human rights particularly in the administration of justice;
7. Emphasizes the importance of education and public information programmes in the field of human rights particularly for law students, the legal profession and all those responsible for the administration of justice;
8. Welcomes the recent entry into force of the African Charter on Human Rights and Peoples' Rights as an important contribution towards improving international protection of human rights;
9. Recommends the holding of special parliamentary sessions on human rights, for example on Human Rights Day, 10 December every year;
10. invites Parliaments to undertake constructive joint efforts at the international level for promotion of human rights in the search for mutual understanding and common ground, for improvement of the general psychological climate of international relations and for solutions to global problems such as hunger, disease, poverty, homelessness, destruction of the environment, thereby contributing to the creation of moral safeguards for the maintenance of peace and for ensuring mankind's safe passage into the third millennium;

11. Requests the Parliaments of member countries to call on their respective Governments to support and step up their action within the framework of the United Nations;
  12. Calls upon the international community to subject to constant review the effectiveness of international and multinational human rights bodies and to suggest improvements;
  13. Expresses recognition of the work being carried out for the protection of human rights by United Nations bodies;
  14. Urges all States to consider, within the framework of the United Nations, the possibility of establishing an international court of justice responsible for examining human rights violations.
- B. With regard to the respect for the fundamental principles, treaties and obligations governing relations among nations in order to solve the problem of refugees and displaced persons

The Conference,

Recalling the contents of the resolution unanimously adopted by the 67th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in 1980 in Berlin (GDR),

Expressing its deep concern at the massive, steady flow of refugees to several regions of the world and at the alarming dimensions which this problem has assumed,

Conscious that the increasing number of refugees and displaced persons is tied to the rise in the number of human rights violations in the world, to the persistence of national and international military conflicts, to foreign interventions and occupations, to social and economic difficulties, and to natural phenomena such as earthquakes, floods, drought and desertification,

Particularly concerned by the fact that in various regions, military or armed attacks, acts of piracy and other forms of brutality, often originating in the countries of refugees origin, continue to pose a grave threat to the safety and well-being of refugees as well as displaced persons and to persons seeking asylum,

Recalling the obligations stemming from the international and regional juridical instruments relating to refugees and displaced persons,

Reaffirming the purely humanitarian and apolitical nature of the activities of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, UNRWA, the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations Border Relief Operation to improve the protection of the rights of refugees and displaced persons and their living conditions,

Concerned that economic difficulties and security problems have, for some years, caused uncontrolled displacements of persons, and that the fact that victims of such situations have been taken in hand by certain channels has resulted in an incipient erosion of the liberal asylum policy of host countries,

Regretting nonetheless the increasingly restrictive policy adopted by the developed countries towards refugees,

Also regretting that certain countries do not contribute financially organizations and programmes for refugees and displaced persons and do not admit refugees to their territories for resettlement purposes,

Deploiring the fact that considerations of a political nature are increasingly taking precedence over the purely humanitarian aspect of the situation of refugees and displaced persons,

Also deploring the violations, by certain countries, of international instruments on assistance to and protection of refugees and displaced persons, in particular the restrictions on the right of asylum and freedom of movement of refugees,

Noting with concern that the majority of refugees are received by the poorer countries which do not possess the capacities and resources even to feed their own populations and which are further strained by the added efforts which hinder their development and could endanger their political and social stability,

Desirous of helping to improve the lot of refugees and displaced persons, and more particularly, to ensure that they enjoy the broadest possible exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Aware of the important role of Parliaments in all these areas as supreme legislative bodies with a decisive influence on the domestic and foreign policies of States,

1. Urges all Governments to contribute to a lasting solution to the problem of refugees and displaced persons, which calls for the elimination of the root causes of the problem, in particular massive and flagrant violations of human rights, internal and

- international military conflicts and the occupation of foreign countries, and which requires the assent and political will of parties, the development of regional co-operation and assistance to the competent international bodies, and reaffirms the right of all refugees to return to their countries in dignity and safety;
2. Calls upon all Parliaments and Governments to be conscious of their responsibility to protect refugees and to receive victims of persecution as defined in the 1951 Geneva Convention relating to the status of refugees;
  3. Urges Governments to ratify the international and regional juridical instruments relating to refugees and displaced persons, or, where applicable, to withdraw their reservations limiting their obligations under those instruments;
  4. Also urges Parliaments to call on their respective Governments to implement effectively these texts;
  5. Denounces bilateral agreements and arrangements which are aimed at restricting the rights of asylum and freedom of movement of refugees and displaced persons;
  6. Supports efforts aiming at better co-ordination of asylum procedures, the granting of asylum and assistance to refugees in developed receiving countries, thus helping to avoid shifting the influx of refugees to neighbouring countries, thereby causing unbearable anguish to those seeking asylum;
  7. Calls for the conclusion of a "Convention on Territorial Asylum", by means of which the legal status of refugees would be improved and standardized worldwide, and for the consideration of a new definition of the terms "refugee" and "country of first asylum";
  8. Urges Parliaments to promote, in co-operation with their executive organs, the establishment of procedures for the formal determination of refugee status in every State;
  9. Further urges States to show greater solidarity in sharing the burden of refugees and displaced persons, and requests them to help the receiving countries in dealing with the added difficulties created by the presence of refugees and asylum seekers, by contributing financial relief and organizational assistance;

10. Invites Parliaments and the international community to give assistance to whole populations which have been dispossessed of their homelands by annexation, occupation, or in other ways, so that they may achieve self-determination and the number of refugees and displaced persons be reduced;
11. Calls upon Parliaments to work towards ensuring that the problem of refugees and displaced persons is given greater consideration in the fields of economic and developmental assistance, as well as in other areas of international co-operation, with a view to creating conditions in the countries and regions of origin that will enable refugees to return to their home countries;
12. Invites States to consider the special plight of displaced persons who have no international legal protection and to envisage drafting appropriate juridical instruments for their protection;
13. Draws the attention of States to the plight of prisoners of war, detainees and civilian populations in zones of armed conflict and other hotbeds of tension, and invites them to support the activities of the International Committee of the Red Cross to protect such persons;
14. Commends the international humanitarian organizations for assistance to and protection of refugees and displaced persons, in particular UNHCR, the ICRC and UNRWA, for their work; urges all States to support those organizations in their efforts to provide lasting solutions to the problem of refugees and displaced persons, mainly by means of voluntary repatriation with the assent and assistance of the persons concerned, but also, when appropriate, through integration in countries of asylum and only with the prior consent of these countries, or resettlement in third countries, and also urges them to increase their material assistance to those organizations;
15. Also commends non-governmental organizations responsible for providing relief and assistance to refugees and displaced persons and stresses the need for States to support those organizations.

CONTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTS TO EFFORTS AIMED AT THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES AND ELIMINATION OF APARTHEID AND ALL FORMS OF RACISM

Draft resolution presented by the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories and Ethnic Questions, by 30 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions

Rapporteur: Mr. A. Nuis (Netherlands)

The 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in United Nations General Assembly resolution 1514 of 14 December 1960, and resolution 2621 of 12 October 1970 containing the Programme of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration and resolution 35/118 of 11 December 1980, the annex to which contains the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Resolution,

Noting UN General Assembly resolution 40/56 of 2 December 1985 on the 25th anniversary of the above Declaration,

Noting in particular the observation in UN General Assembly resolution 40/56 that a large number of former colonial territories have achieved independence, and that many former trust and non-self-governing territories have exercised their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration,

Recognizing the important role played by the United Nations as a whole, and the above Declaration in particular in bringing about the granting of independence to a large number of former colonies, trust and non-self-governing territories,

Reaffirming the right of peoples oppressed by colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism, racial discrimination and apartheid to independence, national sovereignty and self-determination, as well as their right to struggle by all means available, including armed struggle, to achieve those goals,

Aware that since the adoption of the above Declaration, the concept of neo-colonialism has received increased attention,

Stressing that recognition of both the right of self-determination and the principle of territorial integrity, constitutes the basis on which decolonization can be satisfactorily achieved,

Recalling the important role played by Parliaments in all countries in accomplishing the process of decolonization by ensuring respect for the interests of colonial peoples,

Reaffirming its firm determination and its commitment to eradicating totally and unconditionally racism in all its forms, racial discrimination and apartheid;

Expressing solidarity with the international community in its efforts to promote human rights, fundamental freedoms and decolonization, in accordance with the principle of self-determination, and to eliminate apartheid and all forms of racial discrimination,

Condemning any policy which is based on the superiority of one race or ethnic Group over another,

Deeply concerned with the continuous lack of privilege and denial of equal opportunities to ethnic minorities/majorities in certain countries,

Emphasizing the importance of and urgent need to focus international attention on the intolerable oppression and racism in South Africa and Namibia,

Concerned that the welcome bulk of recommendations of the Paris World Conference on Sanctions against Racist South Africa have yet to be implemented primarily because of the self-centred economic interests of certain Western countries in South Africa and Namibia,

Expressing admiration for those who at great personal sacrifice render legal, medical and financial help to mitigate the suffering of children and to inform the world of the barbarious treatment by the racist régime of its most vulnerable citizens,

Convinced that nothing positive can happen in South Africa without the release from prison and detention of all political prisoners and detainees and the participation of the liberation movements in any negotiations to transfer power to the majority,

Viewing with satisfaction the mounting resistance by Blacks to racist laws and the recent Dakar initiative by White liberals from South Africa to talk to the African National Congress (ANC), both of which are indicative of the growing failure of the racist State's propaganda machinery and use of brutal force to intimidate the masses,

Believing that the international community has an obligation to assist Namibians in their fight for self-determination and independence which is separate and not in any way linked to external issues,

Rejecting efforts by the racist South African régime to annex certain parts of Namibia to its territory,

Reaffirming SWAPO's authenticity as the sole legitimate representative of the Namibian people,

Deeply concerned by the fact that the apartheid régime is treating the black majorities in South Africa and Namibia in an increasingly violent and intolerable manner, while trying to ensure that any semblance of opposition is silenced,

Appalled by South Africa's tactics of executing its total onslaught on the neighbouring independent black States, causing destruction worth billions of dollars to the economies of those States and killing and maiming thousands of innocent citizens directly or through its engagement of surrogate bandit groups of UNITA and MNR,

Taking note of the peace initiatives proposed by the People's Republic of Angola with a view to providing an honorable, just and lasting solution to the problems of southern Africa and contained in the platform of comprehensive negotiations submitted in 1984 by His Excellency the President of the People's Republic of Angola, Mr. José Eduardo dos Santos, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, as well as the proposal for a Comprehensive Agreement by Angola, Cuba, South Africa and SWAPO, which was drafted under the auspices of the United Nations Security Council or its permanent members and presented by the Angolan Government to the present United States Government on 4 August 1987,

Commending the flexibility and political will of the Angolan Government in seeking a peaceful settlement to the problems of southern Africa,

Aware that the prevailing poverty of the people of Namibia is the result of the non-compliance of the South African colonial régime with the provisions of United Nations Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia,

Upholding the right of the people of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) to struggle for self-determination and independence,

Supporting the efforts made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the President of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to promote the implementation of relevant resolutions on the right of the Sahrawi people to self-determination and independence through a democratic referendum in order to achieve a just and peaceful solution to that problem,

Expressing its keen concern over the continued tension in Northwest Africa due to the Western Saharan conflict, which represents a grave threat to peace and stability in the region,

Recalling resolutions 38/40, 39/40, 40/50 and 41/16 of the United Nations General Assembly relating to the question of Western Sahara which take up the peace plan of the OAU as contained in resolution ABG/104 (XIX) on Western Sahara which was adopted by consensus by the Conference of Heads of State and Government of the OAU at its Nineteenth Regular Session (Addis Ababa, 6-12 June 1983),

Reiterating the calls by the Inter-Parliamentary Union in recent Conferences for the reaffirmation of the inalienable right of the Sahrawi people to self-determination and independence,

Recognizing the Polisario Front as the sole legitimate representative of the Sahrawi people which is defending its legitimate right to live in peace and to occupy its rightful place among independent States,

Recalling the resolution on the question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) adopted by the 76th Inter-Parliamentary Conference in Buenos Aires in October 1986,

Considering that the situation in East Timor gives rise to concern,

Deeply concerned over the colonial situation that still prevails in Puerto Rico, Guam, the British Virgin Islands, the United States Virgin Islands, the trusteeship territories in the Pacific Ocean, Bermuda and other so-called small territories under the domination of foreign powers, on which many resolutions have been adopted by the General Assembly and other United Nations bodies,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the work of the United Nations in promoting the independence of colonial peoples, based on the principles of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;
2. Remains committed to finding ways and means to support fully all just struggles of peoples still suffering from colonialism, external interference, intervention, hegemonism, destabilization and other forms of domination;

3. Regrets that certain colonial situations still exist while acknowledging the progress made in decolonization, and declares that the continuation of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations, and all forms of racism and apartheid are incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations, the Declaration and the principles of international law;
4. Reaffirms that all Administering Powers are obliged, under the Charter and in accordance with the Declaration, to create economic, social and other conditions in the territories under their administration which will enable those territories to achieve genuine independence and economic self-reliance, and strongly urges the Administering Powers to draw up an urgent time-table for the granting of the right of self-determination to all peoples still under colonial domination;
5. Requests the Administering Powers to preserve the cultural identity, as well as the national unity, of the territories under their administration and to encourage the full development of the indigenous culture, with a view to facilitating the unfettered exercise of the right to self-determination and independence by the peoples of those territories;
6. Resolves once again that all forms of racism and racial discrimination, particularly in their institutionalized form, such as apartheid or resulting from official doctrines of racial superiority or exclusivity, are among the most serious violations of human rights in the contemporary world and must be combated by all available means;
7. Appeals to all Governments and to international and non-governmental organizations to increase and intensify their activities to combat racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and to provide relief and assistance to the victims of those evils;
8. Reaffirms that the policy of apartheid and denial of equal rights to certain ethnic groups of any country are forms of racism deserving condemnation and elimination;
9. Appeals to all States immediately to remove any legal or other restrictions which hinder any ethnic or other groups from the full enjoyment of equal rights as citizens;

10. Reaffirms the legitimacy of the struggle for national liberation in South Africa and Namibia, both morally and legally, as action in self-defence deserving material and moral support by the international community;
11. Welcomes the International Conference on Children, Repression and the Law in apartheid South Africa held in Harare in September 1987 and the impact of its observations and proposals;
12. Condemns the bantustanization of parts of South Africa and the installation of puppet administrations in the Bantustans;
13. Rejects any attempts by the racist régime to involve moderate Black groups in the proposed National Statutory Council as divisive and insignificant to the aspirations of the masses;
14. Also rejects any reforms to the system of apartheid as a shameful and futile attempt to divert international attention from the enormity of the violence and crimes against millions of innocent South Africans;
15. Advocates the release of all political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela and other leaders, as a pre-condition for negotiations involving all political organizations and leading to the abolition of the oppressive and inhuman apartheid system and the establishment of a non-racial society under a government elected by all South Africans by means of a universal adult suffrage in a non-fragmented South Africa;
16. Abhors the imposition of a state of emergency and the detention of members and leaders of civic associations, trade unions, youth, student and women's organizations;
17. Rejects the validity of the Whites-only election, which excluded 85 per cent of the population, as a farce and an affront to the principle of democracy;
18. Recognizes with appreciation the efforts made by six nations' leaders and the Non-Aligned Movement in creating an African Fund under the chairmanship of India to aid the just struggles of the peoples under colonial rule and racial suppression;

19. Calls for an increase in national and international pressure, in the context of the universal call for the imposition on mandatory and effective comprehensive sanctions by the United Nations Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, and the application of economic sanctions against South Africa up to the breaking off of all trade and diplomatic relations; welcomes the positive initiatives already taken by some countries along those lines and condemns those countries which provide succour to the apartheid régime by failing to respond positively to this call;
20. Also calls for the repeal of the Internal Security Act, the racist and Nazi-inspired Population Registration Act and other repressive legislation covering the right of assembly, censorship and police powers;
21. Condemns the racist South African régime for granting its State security system sweeping powers to control the press, ban public meetings and control funerals in the Black townships and giving it blanket indemnity to exercise repression with impunity;
22. Also condemns the racist régime, a signatory to the Geneva protocol of 1977, for executing political activists and captured combatants of the African National Congress (ANC);
23. Encourages a greater understanding of the application of the Nuremberg principles providing for punishment for crimes against humanity and the crime of apartheid under the International Convention for the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid;
24. Appeals to the international community to provide the necessary assistance to the South African and Namibian liberation movements and populations for their welfare and rehabilitation;
25. Further appeals to organizations to monitor closely and combat the indiscriminate detention and imprisonment of masses, especially children under eighteen years, in jails, police cells and "corrective" camps, as well as the exploitation of child labour;
26. Declares that Walvis Bay, the Penguin Islands and all adjacent off-shore islands, in accordance with relevant United Nations resolutions, are integral parts of Namibia;

27. States that the imposition by the Security Council of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, is the only effective and peaceful means remaining to compel South Africa to eliminate apartheid, halt its acts of aggression against the Front-Line States, which are peace-loving and legitimate countries, and end its illegal occupation of Namibia;
28. Categorically rejects once again all linkage between the independence of Namibia and the presence of Cuban troops in the People's Republic of Angola, and reaffirms that the presence of Cuban troops in that country or their withdrawal can only be decided by the sovereign State of the People's Republic of Angola;
29. Strongly condemns all attempts by the apartheid South African régime and its Western allies to divert the attention of the international community from the principal question, namely, the decolonization of Namibia, by cynically pretexting East-West rivalry, thereby merely prolonging the people's suffering;
30. Calls for the immediate dissolution of the puppet provisional administration in Namibia, and reaffirms its unreserved support for United Nations Security Council resolution 566 (1985), which states that the establishment by the racist régime of South Africa of a "provisional" Government in Namibia, in violation of United Nations Security Council resolution 435/78, is illegal and null and void;
31. Calls upon all Western countries to abstain from lending assistance to or co-operating with the apartheid régime in the nuclear field;
32. Strongly condemns the current Government of the United States of America for its flagrant and unacceptable interference in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Angola and for its so-called policy of constructive engagement;
33. Calls for the immediate withdrawal of all racist South African troops from Angolan territory and respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the People's Republic of Angola;
34. Urges the Government of the United States of America and the Government of South Africa to endeavour seriously and without subterfuge to bring peace in southern Africa, in accordance with the initiatives submitted by the Angolan Government on 4 August 1987;

35. Urges all States to provide economic, financial and military assistance to the Front-Line States and the SADCC countries, as an effective way of combating apartheid and with a view to guaranteeing their security and reinforcing their economies which have been weakened by aggression, destabilization and dependence;
36. Requests all Parliaments of the world to urge their respective Governments to take all appropriate measures to ensure that all corporations and individuals within their jurisdiction fully apply and comply with the provisions of Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia;
37. Further requests all Parliaments of the world to encourage their respective Governments to increase their support and assistance for the benefit of the education and training of the Namibian people through the United Nations subsidiary organs established for those purposes and to supply technical assistance in anticipation of the independence of the Namibian people;
38. Calls for the implementation without delay of resolution AHG/104 (XIX) of the Nineteenth OAU Conference and resolutions 40/50 and 41/16 of the United Nations General Assembly so to allow the people of Western Sahara to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination and independence;
39. Recalls resolutions 38/40, 39/40, 40/50 and 41/16 of the United Nations General Assembly and those adopted by the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries at its Eighth Summit in Harare on the question of Western Sahara, which take up the peace plan of the OAU as contained in resolution AHG/104 (XIX);
40. Renews its call to the two parties to the conflict, the Kingdom of Morocco and the Polisario Front, to begin direct negotiations as soon as possible in order to declare a cease-fire and thereby create the necessary conditions for a peaceful and fair referendum, held under the auspices of the OAU and the United Nations and with a view to the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, without any administrative or military constraints, and to fix the modalities thereof;
41. Commends the efforts made by the sitting President of the Organization of African Unity and the Secretary-General of the United Nations to reach a fair and definitive solution to the question of Western Sahara;

42. Calls on all Parliaments to support the efforts of the UN and the OAU to implement the relevant resolutions relating to the decolonization of Western Sahara;
43. Requests Morocco not to compromise the international efforts for a peaceful solution and to put an end to its policy of population settlement aiming at changing the demographic equilibrium in Western Sahara in violation of all international conventions relating to the occupied territories;
44. Reasserts the right of the Argentine Republic to the territory of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), South Georgia and the Sandwich Islands, and reiterates its appeal for a peaceful settlement of the dispute between that country and the United Kingdom, condemning the unilateral decision in relation to the exclusive economic zone established by the United Kingdom;
45. Welcomes the fact that, following the Brussels declaration, Spain and the United Kingdom have established a negotiation process in order to solve all their differences on Gibraltar, including questions of sovereignty;
46. Invites the parties concerned by the East Timor question to work together with the United Nations Secretary-General to find, as soon as possible, a solution in the interests of the populations of that territory according to the principles of self-determination;
47. Reaffirms the right of the people of Puerto Rico to self-determination, independence and sovereignty, in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV) of the United Nations General Assembly, and the full validity of that resolution in the case of Puerto Rico;
48. Supports the decisions and resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly on the territories of Guam, the trusteeship territories of the Pacific Ocean, the British Virgin Islands, the United States Virgin Islands and all other so-called small territories still subjected to colonial domination.

Item 9CONF/78/9-DR.5
16 October 1987CONTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTS TO ACHIEVING COMPREHENSIVE AND JUST PEACE BETWEEN IRAN AND IRAQ AND TO SECURITY OF NAVIGATION IN THE GULF ON THE BASIS OF THE IMPLEMENTATION OF UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 598 (1987)Draft resolution adopted by consensus by the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament*Rapporteur: Mr. M.A. Martinez (Spain)

The 78th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Calling to mind all relevant resolutions adopted by the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the United Nations General Assembly and the United Nations Security Council on the Iran-Iraq conflict,Also calling to mind the statements and efforts by the United Nations Security Council and the United Nations Secretary-General,Guided by the obligation imposed on member States by the United Nations Charter to settle their disputes by peaceful means, in a way that does not endanger world peace and international security, and in their relations with other countries, to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of another country,Confirming once again the firm support, expressed in resolutions of previous Inter-Parliamentary Conferences on the Iran-Iraq conflict, for an immediate cease-fire and the termination of all hostilities, as well as the withdrawal without delay of all forces behind internationally recognized boundaries as a first step towards settling the conflict,Supporting the efforts being undertaken by the United Nations, as well as by the Non-Aligned Movement and the Organization of the Islamic Conference in the search for a peaceful, comprehensive, lasting, just and honorable settlement between Iran and Iraq, which should be based on United Nations Security Council resolution 598 (1987), the principles of which have received wide support by the international community,

---

* Reservations by the delegation of Italy to operative paragraph 3 and by the delegation of Iran (Islamic Republic of) to the word "sequence" in operative paragraph 7.

Convinced that such a settlement can only result from the joint efforts of both parties to the conflict,

Deploing the initiation and continuation of the conflict,

Expressing deep concern at the further escalation and spread of the conflict, thus endangering world peace and international security,

Also expressing deep concern at the bombing of civilian centres and the attacks against neutral States, ships and civilian aircraft,

Deploing the violations of international humanitarian law applicable to armed conflicts, and calling on the parties to the conflict strictly to observe and implement the instruments in force, particularly the Geneva Protocol of 17 June 1925 on the use of chemical weapons and the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the protection of prisoners of war and war victims,

Expressing concern at the fact that despite all the efforts made by international organizations and individual countries, the conflict between Iran and Iraq continues unabated and the two countries have not yet begun peace talks to settle their dispute,

Affirming the right under international law of freedom and security of navigation and deploring the threats to and attacks on merchant shipping and civilian aircraft, which in part have contributed to an increased military presence in the region, a development which has not facilitated the search for a solution to the conflict,

Confirming once again its belief that all Parliaments and parliamentarians bear responsibility with regard to the creation of an atmosphere of trust and understanding in the region,

1. Calls on Iran and Iraq to settle their conflict through negotiations and in a peaceful way, further co-operating with the efforts and proposals of the United Nations Secretary-General, and in particular, by fully implementing United Nations Security Council resolution 598 (1987);
2. Calls on Iran and Iraq to cease attacks on civilian shipping and aircraft and to respect the principle of free navigation for all States;
3. Calls for the re-establishment of freedom and security of navigation in the region and the withdrawal of all military forces therefrom;
4. Calls on all other States to refrain from any acts that might contribute to the continuation, escalation or spread of the conflict;

5. Further calls on all Parliaments and Governments to support and encourage all constructive efforts, particularly those made within the United Nations, to bring about a peaceful, comprehensive, lasting, just and honorable solution to this conflict;
  6. Expresses its firm support once again for the efforts by the United Nations, as well as by the Non-Aligned Movement and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to arrive at a peaceful settlement to the conflict;
  7. Welcomes the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to inquire as to where responsibility lies for the conflict in the manner and sequence stipulated in United Nations Security Council resolution 598 (1987);
  8. Stresses that subsequent steps, even the most severe ones provided for in Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, should be taken if, after the current negotiations, either of the parties fails to comply with United Nations Security Council resolution 598 (1987), which is regarded by world public opinion as the key instrument in solving the conflict;
  9. Urges the international community, and especially the two parties to the conflict, to conform to and respect international humanitarian law, particularly the Geneva Protocol of 17 June 1925 regarding the use of chemical weapons and the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the protection of prisoners of war and war victims;
  10. Expresses its support for the proposal of a reconstruction plan, with appropriate international aid on cessation of the conflict, and for the adoption of measures that could reinforce the security and stability of the region.

TEXT OF SENATOR BONNELL'S SPEECH TO IPU ON AIDS

Mr. Chairman:

My topic for discussion today is one of an economic and social nature.

As a physician and a parliamentarian I am becoming quite concerned about the economic impact on our modern world of a deadly and incurable disease called "AIDS" or Acquired Immuno Deficiency Syndrome.

It has been compared to the "Bubonic Plague" of our earlier European history. This dreaded, fast-spreading disease, although very different than the Bubonic Plague, its consequences are for today's world, equally devastating.

The first case of AIDS in Canada was reported in 1982, eight months after the Syndrome was first described in the U.S.A. Since then, the number of individuals who have contracted AIDS has risen dramatically.

Because of the severity of AIDS, the lack of effective treatment and its epidemic nature, a great deal of public fear, as well as concern in the scientific and public health community have arisen.

AIDS is a consequence of an attack on the body's immune system which directly compromises an individual's ability to fight diseases.

Because of the complex nature of the AIDS virus, a cure or vaccine may not be found for several years.

The projected number of individuals in Canada who will contact AIDS and require medical assistance and hospital care is likely to place a strain on existing medical care and assistance programs, both financially and personnel wise.

A further cause for concern is that the spread of AIDS to so many countries indicates the pandemic potential of the virus.

Since the recognition of AIDS, many major advances have been made in understanding this complex illness. These include

- (1) The identification of the risk factors which increase the risk of contracting AIDS—including social behaviour, blood transfusion, infants from infected mothers, drug users, etc.
- (2) We now recognize the characterization of the virus which is the primary cause of AIDS.
- (3) We have also now developed blood tests that can identify persons who have antibodies to the virus.

But there are still many important questions to be answered before AIDS can be effectively controlled.

The number of AIDS cases in Canada has increased rapidly since it was first discovered in 1982. As of May 1987 there were 1,012 cases of AIDS reported of which 51% had died. In the U.S.A., 35,518 cases of AIDS had been reported by May 1987 with a 58% mortality.

The vast majority of AIDS victims are relatively young. In Canada 45% of the victims have been in the 30-39 year old age group.

This being the case it could cause a great productive and financial loss to any country to lose its young growing productive generation.

It appears possible that the stage is now set for a lethal AIDS pandemic of world wide proportions.

It is estimated that 10 million are now infected on a global scale and the World Health Organization (WHO) predicts 100 million people will be infected by 1991, though it warns this could be a serious underestimate if the virus were quickly to spread to South America and Asia.

AIDS is an international health problem of extraordinary scope and urgency. Governments throughout the world must mobilize to fight this killer.

(1) Through public education on TV, radio, newspapers and other media about its transmission.

(2) To continue to carry out research and development about this virus until we find a cure and wipe it off the face of the earth.

The Government of Canada announced it will be spending $138.1 M on AIDS during the next four years.

$81.0 M on Public Education

27.4 M on Research

13.9 M on International Assistance

8.6 M on Administration

7.2 M on Health and Social Program

The WHO has launched a $31 M education program. The WHO hopes to expand its anti AIDS programs jointly funded by 140 member countries.

I believe it is now time for the I.P.U. to have a special conference on AIDS similar to the one on the environment in Nairobi last year and to the one taking place in Caracas, Venezuela in November this year on Illicit Drugs.

Thank you.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 10, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF
HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place at 4.30 this afternoon.

[English]

Honourable senators, may I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on this occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the Senate Gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner senators will not be excluded from the Senate Gallery because many of the places are occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

Senator McElman: Not today!

Senator Frith: Like the Super Bowl, this is an over-hyped, non-event.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is a matter of opinion.

Senator Frith: Quite, Your Honour, and I am not asking Your Honour for his.

The Hon. the Speaker: I thought you did.

Senator Frith: I meant that I would not expect you to give it.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell presented Bill S-15, to amend the Patent Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, February 16, 1988.

FISHERIES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ATTEND BOSTON SEAFOOD SHOW,
MARCH 8-10, 1988

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That for the purpose of its examination of and report upon the marketing of fish in Canada, and all implications thereof, the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to travel to Boston, United States, to attend the Boston Seafood Show which will take place on March 8-10, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INTERNATIONAL WHALING

IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question regarding the conservation of whales and the operation of the International Whaling Commission. I am sure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has the information at his fingertips, but, if he does not, I would be pleased to have him take notice of the question.

A serious dispute has arisen between Japan and Iceland, on the one side, and the United States, on the other, with respect to the conservation of whales. It was agreed, under the aegis of the International Whaling Commission, that there would be a moratorium on whale hunting until 1990. However, at an informal meeting of six nations, including Canada, which was held in Reykjavik, Iceland, in January, the Japanese announced that they intended to hunt for 300 whales in the current whaling season. At that meeting it is reported that the United States threatened sanctions against Japan if they proceeded with that objective. Japan is reported to have replied that if sanctions were levied they would be accepted and Japan would look for other means of dealing out its own level of sanctions with the United States.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise whether Canada, in participating at that meeting, has also suggested that it would support the U.S. sanctions initiative with sanctions of its own, and whether we are maintaining our commitment to do our best, in international terms, to persuade these countries not to hunt whales at a time when a number of these species are believed to be endangered?

THE ENVIRONMENT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EFFECT OF POLLUTION FROM SUNKEN VESSEL "IRVING WHALE"

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, while we are still talking about whales, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could give us any information about the "Irving Whale," a ship that sank off the coast of Prince Edward Island some ten years or so ago, which is full of oil and could burst open at any time and contaminate our waters? Is any research being done by the environment people or any other branch of the Government of Canada as to the effect on the environment off the coast of Prince Edward Island resulting from the sunken "Irving Whale" at this particular time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall have an update prepared on that for the honourable senator.

FISHERIES

TOXIC MUSSELS—PROGRESS OF RESEARCH

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform this house as to the progress being made by the Department of National Health and Welfare or the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in the research as to the poisonous toxins of mollusks off the Atlantic coast, and if other areas of Prince Edward Island will be permitted to sell their mussels soon.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there again, I shall obtain an up-to-date report and provide it to the honourable senator at the first opportunity.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

PROVINCIAL EDUCATION—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if, as a result of the national forum on post-secondary education held last fall, the government is preparing to take any initiatives or to trigger provincial initiatives in the area of education. Can we anticipate any action as a consequence of that national forum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sure there is, but I shall ask Mr. Crombie to prepare a report.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AIDS—AVAILABILITY AND COST OF DRUG AZT IN CANADA

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can inform this house if he has obtained any information about the availability and cost to patients of a drug, called AZT in its short form, for the treatment of patients with AIDS.

● (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I thought I had brought in a report on this matter some time ago in answer to a question put by the honourable senator, but I shall ask Mr. Epp if there is some further information he is in a position to convey on that matter at this time.

HEALTH PROTECTION BRANCH—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS AND STATEMENT ON ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Since other drugs are also being examined for the treatment of the disease, the epidemic, called AIDS, and in view of the Auditor General's criticism in his recent annual report that it takes over 735 days to review an application for new drugs, instead of the prescribed 120, and as many of these drugs are emergency drugs, for example, those that are needed for the desperate patients with AIDS, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he would table in this house the Stein Commission report and any other reports that have been prepared, or any other action taken by the minister to improve the work of the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will see what documents can properly be released on that subject at this time.

I am not in a position to comment on the Auditor General's report or his findings in that regard, except to say that I am sure honourable senators would not want the work of the Health Protection Branch in this regard to proceed too hastily.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two questions, which I ask be printed as part of today's proceedings.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RESTORATION OF SOREL-NICOLET BRANCH LINE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 1 last by the Honourable Fernand-E. Leblanc regarding Transport—Canadian National Railways—Restoration of Sorel-Nicolet Branch Line.

(The answer follows:)

In accordance with the Railway Act, Canadian National must accommodate all traffic offered to it by shippers. It is only after the railway has exhausted its best effort to attract new business, and the line in question is still operating at a loss, that it will prepare to apply for abandonment. CN must apply to the National Transportation Agency (NTA) for permission to abandon each line, and this permission will only be granted after an extensive review of each case in terms of economics, transportation alternatives and the public interest.

CN did file such a request on November 2, 1987, for the abandonment of the Sorel-Saint-Grégoire section.

The legal process to be followed is a very democratic one: organizations and individuals affected will be able to submit their arguments to the NTA.

It would not be appropriate for the Minister to intervene in this process.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

INCREASE IN MARINE ATLANTIC FERRY RATES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 10 last by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell regarding Prince Edward Island—Increase in Marine Atlantic Ferry Rates.

Rate increases are recommended on a regular basis in order to help offset rising operating costs and to control subsidy levels.

Recently, the Minister of Transport approved ferry rate increases of 4 per cent for subsidized services in Atlantic Canada. The increase has been kept to the level of inflation and is not expected to hurt traffic or the economy in the region.

On the Borden, PEI and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick service, the passenger fare will increase to $2.40 up 10 cents from the current cost while rates for cars rise by 25 cents to $6.25. On the North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland service fares will increase 50 cents to $12.50 a passenger and by $1.50 to $38.50 an auto.

The changes came into effect on January 1, 1988, or will come into force at the beginning of the operating season for Marine Atlantic Inc. services and five other services operated by private companies.

The senator's question concerning the disposal of ice-breaking ferries is premature since no final decision has yet been made to build a fixed link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. In the event that a fixed link is constructed and the existing ships become surplus to requirements, they would be disposed of in accordance with the rules governing the disposal of surplus crown assets.

EDUCATION

SCHOOL SYSTEM—ROLE OF PARENTS—ROLE OF NATIONAL COMMISSION OF FRANCOPHONE PARENTS—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to notices of inquiry:

Hon. Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 1, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the role of parents as essential partners in the school system, and more particularly to the Canadian government's duty to support parents in assuming this role and to enable the national commission of francophone parents to participate with federal and provincial governments in the process of developing measures and programs aimed at the French-language school population in Canada.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise today to urge acceptance of the message from the other place on Bill C-84.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): To "urge," is that the word?

Senator Nurgitz: "Urge" acceptance of the message. My colleague, Senator Roblin, thinks that is quite good.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I want to ask Senator Doody and Senator Nurgitz: Are we still dealing with just consideration of a message? I know that yesterday we did. The order before us then was taking the message into consideration, and it was taken into consideration yesterday by Senator Kelly, speaking not on a motion but on consideration of the message. I then had some comments to make about his intervention.

Previously, in these circumstances, we have had either a motion for concurrence or a motion that we do not insist on our amendments. I am not urging that we have such a motion; I would just like to understand what it is Senator Nurgitz is speaking to. Is he speaking to a motion that we concur in the message from the other place? We do not have before us a motion to that effect.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in response to the question, I have some comments to make and will conclude by formally moving a motion of concurrence.

Senator Frith: That's fine.

Senator Nurgitz: As honourable senators are aware, the government has accepted, in whole or in part, many of the recommendations from this chamber on this important piece of legislation. The comments from the Senate came about as a result of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I think all senators know that that committee studied this legislation very thoroughly.

Bill C-84 addresses an issue of extreme concern to Canadians—the flagrant abuse of Canada's refugee claims process by illegal immigrants, criminals and terrorists. After years of steady growth, the number of refugee claims received in Canada has jumped from some 9,000 in 1985 to some 26,000 in 1987. We now have a backlog of more than 40,000 claims pending, and that 40,000 backlog has arisen in just the last 18 months. I regret to inform senators that this backlog is growing by some 2,500 claims or more every month. Thousands of recent claimants have arrived with fraudulent documents or no documents at all. There is a growing concern that criminals, arms dealers and terrorists are taking advantage of this situation for their own ends.

Bill C-84 and Bill C-55, which is now the subject of study undertaken by our committee—in fact, I left the committee yesterday as it was making its way through western Canada—are essential parts of the government's strategy for restoring the integrity of Canada's immigration and refugee programs. In addition, Bill C-84 was introduced to send a message worldwide that Canada would no longer tolerate abuse of its system and would deal with security risks. The passage of Bill C-55 will establish a new refugee determination system in Canada. On the other hand, Bill C-84 is part of the process to improve the system.

Honourable senators, this legislation has received careful scrutiny by two legislative committees, that of the House of Commons and our own Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, each of which has made, as a result of listening to various witnesses, some suggestions for change. Of course, our own committee's changes were substantial.

Minister Bouchard met with the Senate committee on December 8, at the conclusion of more than three months of Senate hearings on the bill. In his appearance before the committee he was helpful and conciliatory. Naturally, the minister indicated that he would not change the principles of the bill. However, he demonstrated his sensitivity to questions of Charter challenges and indicated his willingness to consider amendments that addressed those concerns and clarified the bill.

The minister obviously gave careful consideration to the report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. In his address to the other place, on January 26 of this year, Minister Bouchard accepted nine of our recommendations. He also sought and received unanimous consent to make changes that did not fit within the confines of his response but which fulfilled his undertakings to this chamber. Two recommendations came as a result of suggestions from the Department of Justice.

Mr. Bouchard rejected those amendments which were found to be inconsistent with the principles of the bill or to be unhelpful in achieving its objectives.

The minister stated the objectives of Bill C-84 as follows:

The primary objective of the bill is to protect genuine refugees. The bill seeks to deter the wholesale abuse of the refugee claims system that has taken place over the last ten years. It creates a scheme of penalties to ensure that abusers are properly punished.

● (1420)

These provisions do not affect the thousands of genuine refugees whom we bring to Canada each year. They do not make it more difficult for people who need our help to obtain it.

The amendments which the government has accepted include: substituting the term "illegal entry" for the word "smuggling" in the bill's statement of objectives.

There is also an accepted amendment amending the English version of subsection 103.02(1), changing the ground for issuing a search warrant from "evidence that may be found" to "evidence that will be found," and by permitting the judge to review the reasonableness of a security certificate. Originally the legislation was drafted that a judge would merely review the material that was before the Solicitor General and the Minister of Immigration in issuing a security certificate—that is to say, that someone was a security risk. A judge can now look at all reasonable evidence.

Amendments were also made providing discretion to the Federal Court judge with regard to the presence of the person concerned at hearings involving alleged security risks; and other amendments requiring the personal written consent of the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General for the prosecution of those who organize illegal immigration.

Another amendment that was accepted was to provide for a weekly review of the detention of unidentified arrivals and suspected security risks by an adjudicator. This change maintains the additional powers for detention, but ensures compliance with the Canadian law that every person detained by the government has his or her detention reviewed by an independent tribunal.

Honourable senators, these changes address many of the most serious concerns of senators and the public at large. I think they improve the bill. In making these changes the minister has demonstrated his good faith and careful attention to the legislative process.

There are areas, of course, where the minister did not agree with this chamber's recommendations. The minister has indicated that the recommendation of the Senate to grant the right to make a refugee claim to persons who pose a risk to the security of Canada is one that he rejected. It was rejected on the ground that no country has an obligation to protect a person who is a serious criminal or who constitutes a threat to its security. We in the Senate have already accepted this principle in the case of war criminals, and, in any event, the 1951 Geneva Convention on Refugees specifically excludes such persons from the benefits of the convention.

A very contentious issue was the turning away of ships. The Senate recommended the abolition of any power by which the Minister of Employment and Immigration could turn ships away.

Honourable senators, the minister argues that this authority is required in order to send a clear message to the world. Right now there are stories of the unscrupulous selling of boat passages to migrants in Europe, with a guarantee of a long stay in Canada.

Honourable senators, particularly those from the coasts of our country, will know that in 1986 and 1987 the migrants were fortunate to land safely. I am speaking of the two boat incidents. The risks of sea voyages and landings are great. We must remove the largest selling point that unscrupulous merchants employ to persuade people to take those risks—that is, as I have said, the guarantee of a long stay in Canada.

Senators will note further that the minister does not reject the argument that bringing ships into port may be the appropriate action. Rather, the government is saying that it is not the only action. The government requires that option to turn those ships away. This is not a power that is aimed at situations of direct flight from homelands. It is aimed at the traffic in illegal migrants between countries that are signatories to the UN Refugee Convention.

The minister has not accepted any changes to the substance of this provision. In order to provide yet another safeguard, however, the government has adopted an amendment which will ensure that the decision to use this power will be taken personally by the responsible minister. Further, as one reads the section carefully one notes that due regard is given to the safety of passengers, to the seaworthiness of the ship, to its being able to make its way back to port, and, as well, that it could only be turned away in strict compliance with the UN Refugee Convention.

The Senate sought to change the penalty provisions to import the notion of "manifestly unfounded claims." The government rejects this change as impractical. The additional requirement of a finding on the quality of a refugee claim leads to issues of jurisdiction between criminal courts and refugee tribunals. It also leads to further delays in the prosecution of such cases. The Senate recommended amendments which would have limited powers of search and seizure, and confined warrantless search in instances where lives are at risk. That is, warrantless searches for the purpose of obtaining evidence only would not be allowed. The minister accepted the more narrow definition proposed in the Senate report. Restriction on its exercise, however, has not been accepted, because the amendment would seriously hamper the ability of our investigating officers to apprehend and prosecute those who organize groups of illegal migrants. Transborder schemes could be conducted, perhaps, mainly at night so that the perpetrators could escape Canadian jurisdiction if something went wrong.

This chamber recommended that the penalties for organizing illegal migration be restricted to those events carried out in a "clandestine" manner. The minister has rejected that amendment. He has indicated that if the amendment were adopted it would allow ships to steam right into Halifax harbour, with their unauthorized passengers, and the government would not have the power to do anything. The practices the government is trying to deter are not always clandestine. We need to deter not just those practices that are clandestine but all forms of illegal entry. Let me be clear, as well, that during consideration of that matter before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee a great deal of time was spent by members on both sides of this chamber arguing as to the appropriateness of the wording. While the word "clandestine" may well have been something of a consensus in the committee, it was not unanimously accepted by either side.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the government's overriding concern is twofold: to continue to offer protection to genuine refugees, and, second, to stop the flagrant abuse of our refugee claims or refugee claims system. I suggest that Bill C-84 is the first step in dealing with these concerns. I recommend that we not delay the passage of this bill, as it would do a grave disservice both to genuine refugees and to the Canadian public.

At the current rate, the backlog of refugee claims will exceed 50,000 by the end of March. By not moving quickly to close a gaping loophole in our defences we are inviting more and more dangerous abuses. In the past two summers we have seen two boatloads of illegal migrants arriving off our shores, in perilous circumstances. This is not a comment on migrants. It is a condemnation of the unscrupulous and the immoral persons who engage in this form of human transportation. At the same time, thousands upon thousands of persons have arrived at our airports, with little or no identification. We cannot allow this situation to deteriorate any further. I suggest that we proceed as quickly as we can so as to be helpful in this matter. We in this chamber recognized the need to improve security and to reform the refugee process. We all know that the increasing flow of refugee claimants is harmful. It is harmful to the genuine refugees who need our help and protection. It is harmful to the integrity of our immigration policy, a policy which, I suggest, ought to be aimed at increasing legal immigration to this country. It is harmful to the public support of our generosity toward genuine refugees and those who legally immigrate to Canada.

Honourable senators, if I thought that the Senate had failed to study this matter adequately when we received the bill I might agree that we should study it further. However, I am not so certain that that is the case. I think the Senate committee has given this bill very careful consideration. We know that the minister and the government did not adopt a belligerent or intransigent position. Our concerns were carefully noted and considered. Where the minister thought he could make changes he did so.

I urge honourable senators to adopt the bill as it now stands. It is the product of a healthy legislative process between our two chambers. With that in mind, honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1, 2(a), 3, 7, 13(b), (c) and (d) to the Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 4, 5(a), (b) and (c), 6(a) and (b), 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13(a);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 11 and 16; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1, 2(a), 3, 7, 13(b), (c) and (d) to the Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 4, 5(a), (b) and (c), 6(a) and (b), 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13(a);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 11 and 16; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried—

Senator Frith: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we did not hear any objection to that motion.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, we will have something to say on this matter. Senator Grafstein will start.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Grafstein?

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, the House of Commons has now sent us their specific amendments in response to our message and amendments to Bill C-84, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof. The Honourable Benoît Bouchard, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, carefully reviewed our message and our amendments.

Honourable senators will recall that we proposed 20 amendments under 13 headings and made a number of other recommendations and suggestions. The government has now accepted nine of the 13 amendments in principle, with some minor drafting revisions. Also, two additional major amendments were proposed by the government and passed, partially in response to our message. These included the written consent of the Attorney General of Canada or the Deputy Attorney General for the prosecution of those who organize illegal immigration. This amendment made by the government was in response to the minister's undertaking to our committee and the Senate's suggestion that the principle of accountability—in other words, the minister's accountability to Parliament—should be expressly incorporated in the legislation so that should the government decide to prosecute persons who may violate the Immigration Act pursuant to a humanitarian impulse this amendment would act as one check, at least, on an abuse of this power and compel the minister to be directly accountable to Parliament for his actions or his deputy if that power is abused.

The role of the Senate in respect to the Senate's amendments to Bill C-84 and the response of the government to those amendments differs from the Senate's role in consideration of previous bills. In this case the role of the Senate is now different, since the 1982 passage of the Constitution. No longer can we agree with Bismarck's edict: "Laws are like sausages. It is better not to see them being made." The role of the Senate under the Constitution must be a transparent role. We must appear to be constitutionally correct. Indeed, Parliament, including the Senate, has been reformed since the introduction of the Charter and the Constitution in 1982. The Charter has placed Parliament, the House and the Senate below the law. Parliament is no longer supreme. Rights of individuals cannot be tampered with by a government, by Parliament, by a House of Commons or by a Senate. So, the paramountcy of the Charter and the paramountcy of the Constitution is supreme. This is a dramatically different element in law-making, and it is now democratically accepted by all parts of the country.

The role of the Senate with respect to Bill C-84 amendments and the government's response to these amendments is thus different because of the nature of evidence received by committees and the Senate in respect to previous bills considered in the Senate. The Senate, as a legislative parliamentary body, which has been democratically imbedded in a democratically-approved Constitution, has to demonstrate that the amended bill is still not seriously constitutionally flawed, particularly when there appears to be unanimous evidence to that effect. It appears that the other place has not produced any new evidence that the amendments they did not pass had been repaired or were free of such flaws. It appears that these unamended provisions still contravene the Constitution, still contravene the Charter, and still contravene the international covenants and obligations that Canada so solemnly entered into and adopted.

The question before us is whether or not those remaining flaws have been repaired. You will recall, honourable senators, that the evidence that we heard in committee was not partisan, as Senator Nurgitz pointed out, but covered the broad political consensus amongst professional and volunteer groups and amongst all regions of the country. That is why the Senate, in my view, did not divide on this issue.

Let me congratulate the minister. I believe it was the intent of the senators of both parties, as well as those senators who sit independently, that the concerns elicited from public-spirited groups, as well as professional groups, that came before the committee were truly bi-partisan and non-political in their nature. Nobody was prepared to make any gains on a political basis. Indeed, this was a rather interesting and unique opportunity for all senators to focus on the issues, rather than the Senate as a proper instrument granted full powers under a democratically approved Constitution. The work of the Senate on Bill C-84 did not thwart the democratic will of the House. Rather, the work of the Senate made Bill C-84 more constitutionally acceptable and ultimately more democratically acceptable.

Therefore, I credit the minister and government that they did not seek to bait the public and to raise the straw spectre of the Senate as a negative, undemocratic force. Rather, the minister focussed on the proper considerations—the pith and substance of the Senate amendments of Bill C-84 itself and recommendations. In the process I believe that there has been a change in the attitudes of the public and the media towards the Senate. Despite the political fireworks last summer, the Senate indeed did act as a chamber of sober second thought. It sought to obtain the views of those committed citizens and those committed volunteers and professionals who give of their time and effort “pro bono” and “pro publico” in the public and national interest. The Senate sought to ensure that all regions were fully and fairly heard. The Senate sought to reduce the heat and increase the clarity of thinking in a quiet and rational manner, in a manner that did not infect its thinking with the virus of public hysteria that is so easily injected into the body politic by the government or by those in the electronic media, who seek to highlight controversy and have difficulty grappling with complex issues on the nightly news.

So we are here, honourable senators, to praise the minister, to praise his open attitude, and to congratulate the government on its willingness to improve on this most important bill. We are pleased that there is no divisive controversy over the bill's major principles and objectives. We all want to invite genuine refugees to Canada. There is a national consensus that we want a fair and efficient bill to restore, as the minister so properly stated, “the integrity of Canada's immigration and refugee program.” Canadians are law abiding. Canadians respect their laws and expect those who come from other lands to respect their laws as well. Canadians do not like abuses of their system. Canadians want to be civilly obedient. All Canadians agree it is necessary to protect genuine refugees. All Canadians agree with Clarence Darrow, the great American lawyer called the “Attorney for the Damned,” who said: “You can only protect your liberties in this world by protecting the other man's freedoms. You can only be free if I am free.”

[Senator Grafstein.]

Canadians agree with that. Canadians agree that the strength of our people depends on our attitudes to freedom for others.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, there is a genuine consensus in the country from the government, from the spokespersons of the various groups, opposition parties, volunteers and professionals that we all want a humane and efficient refugee policy. However, we are seeking, at the same time, a just system. Canadians also accept that the means must be just in accordance with the well-debated and well-established Charter, with our accepted international obligations and our existing standards of criminal deterrence.

And while we are praising the government and the members in the other place, we should, at the same time, congratulate Senator Neiman and Senator Nurgitz, the chairman and deputy chairman, respectively, of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and the staff of that committee who participated over long and difficult hours to help shape and refine the Senate's message so that it could go to the other place quickly and expeditiously and in a targeted fashion. There was no excessive rhetoric in that message. As a result, we approached our task in a non-partisan way, we approached our task in a non-political way, and I believe that we obtained a broad consensus in the Senate for our amendments. No opposition was registered, because the spirit and commitment of all senators was directed towards the same goals, towards common goals.

So today, honourable senators, we are not seeking to have a rematch ping-pong game where Canadians focus on the plays rather than the policies. We are seeking in this place to obtain once again consensus on the remaining matters that cause many of us difficulty, that still cause many of the groups that appeared before us difficulty. We hope that the minister will understand our position and will understand that we are not trying to frustrate his will or to obstruct his policies or delay his objectives.

Before proceeding to the three areas of concern, let me dwell on a major misconception, in Parliament, in the government and in the media, respecting the role of Parliament and, in particular, the role of the Senate. Under the Constitution, particularly arising out of the recent Supreme Court of Canada decision on abortion, critics have suggested that the Supreme Court of Canada and the courts are now the “bosses” of the political processes. This is not correct either in theory or in practice. The Supreme Court of Canada and the supreme courts of the provinces have clearly indicated time and time again that their role is not to make law, their role is to determine whether the laws passed by Parliament or the legislatures contravene the Charter or contravene the division of powers in the Constitution. The judges have said, in effect, that it is not their job to remedy sloppy legislation, that that is the job of the provincial legislatures and of Parliament. The courts presume, when an individual challenges any legislation, that the laws passed by Parliament or a provincial legislature are constitutionally valid. Therefore, there is a higher duty on Parliament—on the House of Commons and on the Senate—to ensure that the laws that are passed do not contravene the Charter.

I do not belong to the school that says that if lawyers or others challenge the constitutionality of draft legislation on the basis of some alleged constitutional flaw Parliament should immediately run to the courts for a preliminary or a declaratory judgment. That is irresponsible government. That is an irresponsible Parliament. That is an irresponsible Senate. Such action would clearly delegate powers to the courts, which the courts themselves do not want. The courts do not relish usurping Parliament's primary function. The Chief Justice has said as much. Therefore, the onus on Parliament, the onus on the Senate as an integral part of Parliament, is to take account of all integral parts of our constitutional framework and seek to pass legislation that is constitutionally valid and that conforms to our Charter.

This applies as well to our international obligations. Such action would clearly delegate conforming powers to the courts, which the courts are reluctant to accept. We have incorporated international obligations as part of our domestic law by many statutes of Canada. Therefore, it is equally important that we examine carefully our international obligations and seek to have our Canadian laws conform to those covenants and obligations. If we are uncomfortable with our international treaty obligations, then we should seek an amendment to those obligations. We should opt out if we do not wish to conform. Our international covenants become standards, if not the domestic law of the land. Foreign policy can only be a reflection of our domestic practices and domestic laws. Therefore, the challenge to the Senate, the challenge to Parliament, is to act as a legislator, not as a blind trustee that blindly passes legislation by closing its eyes to constitutional or international flaws and says, "They will be fixed up by the courts," or, even more imprudently, to suggest that citizens should seek to have their rights redressed by the courts rather than seek redress from the legislative processes of Parliament itself.

So, honourable senators, we cannot take our legislative responsibilities lightly in this matter. We cannot turn a blind eye. Canadians expect us to take our international obligations as seriously as we do our domestic laws, and we in the Senate, I believe on all sides, have sought to do so in a careful, prudent and restrained manner. We have not sought to be excessive in our rhetoric or excessive in our requests. We have sought to honour the responsibilities of government and respect the constitutionally restricted role of the courts.

But, honourable senators, let us turn to those areas that still give us cause for concern. First, the provisions dealing with the turning back of boats. We were clearly told and heard overwhelming evidence before the Senate committee, which appears not to have been changed by any new evidence adduced in the other place, that the government would be in breach of Canada's international obligations if we turned away boats. To do so would be inconsistent with our international convention obligations. The minister has implied that his concern is not so much with our international obligations but with the question of symbolism. He wants a symbol of deterrence. I say to all honourable senators that symbolism is important, symbolism as a deterrent is important, but it is not important if it contravenes our international convention obligations. That symbolism diminishes the power of and respect for the government's authority.

We adopted in 1948 the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights; we adopted the 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees; and, finally, we adopted the Refugee Protocol of 1967 in 1968. What these various protocols, conventions and obligations say is that a contracting party such as Canada will not turn back a refugee without due process, except on the grounds of national security or public order. A refugee should be allowed to submit evidence to a competent authority. Where there are compelling reasons of national security or public order we can lawfully deport a refugee, provided we allow a reasonable period for such a refugee to obtain legal admission elsewhere.

It is virtually impossible, therefore, to see how we can maintain the symbol as a deterrent to turn boats away and still conform to our international conventions. How can we determine, when a boat is on the high seas, whether it carries genuine refugees without some form of due process? What jeopardy do we place such genuine refugees in if we leave it to an unscrupulous sea captain to put human cargo overboard 200 miles away from our shore? Will this act as a deterrent? Will this be a discouragement? The evidence seems to suggest that the number of people who come by boat is minuscule compared to those who arrive by charter flight, by car, by bus or by foot.

The minister certainly does not intend to turn back other modes of transportation. What national or international reaction would be provoked by a symbol that projects a double standard?

But, honourable senators, we understand the frustration of the minister. We understand the comments of Senator Nurgitz. We understand their desire to remove the abuses. Surely there are other more appropriate ways to meet our international obligations, create a symbolism of deterrence, and still avoid these dramatic boat replays. Let us not mix our legal metaphors and our deterrent symbols. Canadians do not want history to repeat itself with respect to turning away boats.

The other day, honourable senators, I read the following words by a celebrated refugee, Anatoly Sharansky, and I think they will find an echo in this chamber. He said this when he first arrived in a land of freedom:

They tried their best to find a place where I was isolated. But all the resources of a superpower cannot isolate a man who hears the voice of freedom, a voice I heard from the very chamber of my soul.

Honourable senators, I believe all Canadians share that cry, that cri du coeur.

• (1450)

The next area of concern are the excessive police powers which the government seeks to grant to immigration officials in the search and seizure provisions of Bill C-84. Here the amendments that were proposed by the Senate committee were careful. They were a means of avoiding what the Senate, and virtually all of our witnesses, indicated were constitutional flaws in that portion of the bill. The question of police powers has been considered by our courts. When it comes to the question of constitutionality of police powers the courts have adopted a test of proportionality. In other words, where there appear to be excessive powers given to the police, they must be appropriate to the circumstances. The means must be legislated in such a fashion that they are limited to what is necessary for the purposes intended. Here the powers sought by the government appear to exceed those sought by Parliament for drug busting, treason or murder. If, in fact, the minister or his officials can demonstrate that immigration officials must have these excessive powers to curb refugee abuses, I think he should target his evidence to that particular comment and that particular line of reasoning.

We do not wish the refugee process to be bogged down. It would become bogged down if these powers were challenged in the courts, and, in turn, the courts said that the police powers were excessive. This, in turn, would clog the very process that we are all seeking to reform. We must carefully review and consider, honourable senators, what the minister has said with respect to these powers and determine whether or not he has indeed sought appropriate power within constitutional limits.

Others have suggested that on the question of security risks a person's criminal record should in itself determine a person as a security risk. This principle, again, appears to be contrary to our international treaty obligations. This issue was widely debated in the other place last week. We should carefully, quickly, and without any delay, review the minister's comments with respect to this issue to come up with a fair and appropriate response.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I do not believe the Senate wishes to debate anew the goals of Bill C-84. I do not believe the Senate wishes to challenge the government's powers to administer, to frustrate the government's goals, or to delay. I do believe that all senators will wish to ensure that the laws that we pass are targeted, appropriate, fair, constitutionally correct and in conformity with our international obligations.

Finally, let me return to the role of the Senate. It was particularly gratifying, honourable senators—and I suggest you all do this—to read Hansard of the other place and the spokesmen's references and comments about the role of the Senate and these amendments. It was gratifying to hear the positive comments made on all sides of the House about the role of the Senate with respect to these amendments, particularly from those in the other place who in the past did not find the Senate either an agreeable or compatible democratic institution.

The work that we proposed with respect to the amendments and the contents of our amendments were well received. Clearly the role of the Senate as a Charter champion is a role that can only benefit Parliament and all Canadians. We want to do our work. We want to do it cost effectively. We want to do our work in committee quickly. Let us refer this bill quickly to a committee, examine the areas of concern expeditiously, and seek a broad consensus in the Senate, on all sides, to see if the evidence still warrants the remaining amendments we considered fair and reasonable. Let us do so in the realization that the role of the Senate, as envisaged by the founding Fathers of Confederation, can be fully and fairly restored.

Finally, let us prove the adage of Machiavelli wrong. Machiavelli said that "Princes and governments are more dangerous than other elements of society." Let us save the government from itself. The Senate has work to do. Let us do so quickly and in good faith.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is a little past three o'clock now. Pursuant to the order of the house, we shall now go into Committee of the Whole, if it is agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, there are several third readings on the order paper and the second reading of Bill C-60. It is not my intention to try to delay the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole, but would I be safe in assuming that we will be able to deal with these tomorrow afternoon? We would like to have Bill C-60, the Copyright Act, referred to committee before the break.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is it the intention to have Royal Assent tomorrow for the third readings?

Senator Doody: Yes. We have three bills and, if possible, I would like to have them cleaned up before we break.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is no doubt that we should deal with third reading of the bills referred to by Senator Doody before the end of this week—and, if we have a chance, today. But if Royal Assent is arranged for them, tomorrow would be adequate. We should also strive to get Bill C-60 to a committee this week.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, our witnesses are waiting without. If the committee is ready to proceed, we will invite our first witness to enter.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Professor Albert Breton was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this afternoon we have three witnesses who have come from some distance—one from Toronto and two from the west coast. It is unfortunate that when the planning was done for this some time ago we did not know that the budget would be announced on the same day. However, having made the commitment it was impossible to have the date changed.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, our first witness this afternoon is Professor Albert Breton who teaches at the University of Toronto. I may add that he received part of his education in my native province of Manitoba.

Honourable senators, I sent you a summary which is on your desks, so I don't think any further introduction of Professor Breton is necessary, but I would like to welcome him to this Chamber and tell him how pleased we are to have him with us this afternoon.

Honourable senators, we do not have a summary of the presentation Professor Breton intends to make this afternoon. We will listen to the presentation directly.

Professor, our normal practice is to give you about 20 minutes for your presentation, followed by a question period. We have one hour altogether.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, you said that we had a summary provided by our witness.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I was referring to his curriculum vitae.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I suppose you mean a career summary.

The Chairman: Yes, but not a summary of the presentation he intends to make this afternoon.

Professor Breton, you may of course use either official language, as you prefer. We are delighted to have you with us, and you may now proceed.

Professor Albert Breton, Department of Economics, University of Toronto: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will read a text I prepared for the committee and which I drafted in English. It is of course understood that during the subsequent question period, I will answer your questions in either of Canada's two official languages.

There are three points I wish to consider in my presentation. If the senators want to ask questions about other subjects either directly or indirectly related to my text, I will of course try to answer to the best of my ability.

[English]

How should we evaluate constitutions and constitutional procedures? There is, of course, no unique and natural way of doing so, nor are the principles which may be efficient at one time necessarily valid for all times. For example, prior to what may be called the "constitutional revolution of 1981-82,"

Canada's Constitution served primarily to regulate the governmental institutions of the country and the relationships between them. For that reason the Constitution was very much the preserve of jurists and of legal experts. No one else really cared.

The revolution of 1981-82—if you will allow me to continue using this expression—brought the Canadian people into the Constitution. The document still regulates intergovernmental relationships, but, in addition, it also regulates the relationships of the governments of Canada with the people of Canada. As a consequence, Canadians are now in the process of becoming a constitutional people.

In that capacity, they are not only developing views about what their governments can and cannot do to them but also about such arcane matters as the division of powers; the role of the Senate; the structure of government; and many others. No one should be surprised, therefore, that the 1987 Meech Lake Constitutional Accord has provoked—in all senses of that word—so many Canadians and induced a large number—in spite of their wish to see Quebec formally join the Canadian constitutional family—to organize against the accord, though the media and the political establishment seem to be finding it difficult to accept that the pre-1981-82 dispensation is really passing.

If what I have said is a good approximation of the truth, it follows that the ongoing discussions as to the virtues and faults of this or that amending formula are really of secondary importance. What is profoundly wrong in the procedure to amend to the Constitution is that it is done by 11 persons, without popular input. We must find ways to end a practice which is no longer befitting. When the Constitution's primary function was the structuring of intergovernmental relations it might have been appropriate—though, no doubt, a bit too cosy—for the parties involved to settle matters alone among themselves. This they can no longer do. The efforts that the signatories to the accord have displayed to muzzle the Canadian public are truly indecent.

A new amending procedure, suitable to the new dispensation, must be devised and put in place. The legitimacy of government is at stake. I would like to suggest that it should be a priority of the Senate to give prominence to that question.

Constitutions serve many purposes. They can, as does the post-1981-82 Canadian Constitution, serve to guarantee rights and freedoms. Many Canadians are profoundly disturbed by what they perceive to be the effects of the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord on rights they thought they had won. I do not want to add to this debate except to say that, at the minimum, the accord has increased the level of uncertainty surrounding the Charter's rights and freedoms. The fact that Ms. X says "Yea" and Mr. Y says "Nay" on what has happened to the Charter's rights is proof of that proposition.

The more uncertain a right becomes, the more it is like a right denied. I surmise that the architects of the Meech Lake Accord would have no problem grasping this fact if, somehow, uncertainty in respect of their right to property was to be increased by as much as the accord has increased uncertainty with respect to basic Charter rights. The augmentation of the uncertainty makes the accord retrogressive on the rights issue.

A constitution, to be efficient, must do more than guarantee rights and freedoms; it must also, as a priority, foster political stability. In two respects the Meech Lake Accord, if it becomes law, will not fulfill that function if and when stability is challenged. These are: first, the "distinct society" provision, and, second, the mechanism envisaged for appointments to the Senate and to the Supreme Court.

You are no doubt aware that I appended to the report of the Macdonald Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada a longish text, which the report's copy editor quaintly labelled a "supplementary report," but which is, in effect, a minority report. In it I argued, among other things, that the relationships between governments in any federation are, in their original state, competitive relationships. That view raises a serious analytical problem, because, as economic theory teaches us, competition can be stable and efficient, but it can also be unstable and destructive.

I do not have the time or the competence to analyze all the conditions which would ensure that intergovernmental competition is always stable and beneficial. That task has not even been completed in conventional economics, but some conditions can be specified. In my minority report I focussed on what federal or central governments in federations could do to promote that end. I will not repeat here what I wrote there. I will instead focus on numbers.

Ever since the systematic analysis of competition was begun by Cournot in 1838, economic theory has emphasized the role played by the number of competitors in a market on the stability and on the outcome of competitive behaviour. The results of a century and a half of concentrated research can be summarized and, unfortunately, caricatured as follows: When numbers are small, competition is less stable and less productive than when numbers are large.

Applied to the matter which concerns us here, one would have to say that intergovernmental competition in the Canadian federation would be less stable and less productive if the number of provinces were smaller than it is now. It could even become destructive. It is in that light that I suggest one must evaluate the "distinct society" clause as that clause is written and positioned in the 1987 Constitutional Accord. One of the implications of that clause is that for a class of issues, whose dimension is unknown, but which is surely very large, the number of competing governmental units in the federation will be reduced to two—Ottawa and Quebec. Why? Simply because the accord defines the distinctiveness of Quebec in relationship to the rest of Canada and not in relation to the distinct societies which are Newfoundland, Alberta or Ontario. That will serve to destabilize intergovernmental relations in the Canadian Federation in respect to some subjects.

It would be possible to document the point by reference to historical cases. Let me simply mention that there is an important school of historians which traces the origin of the Civil War in the United States to a polarization of the country into north and south, a polarization which, on a basic issue, effectively reduced the number of competing entities to two.

It has been said that the "distinct society" clause has no real meaning, that it is more or less a symbolic sop. I take exception to that view, as anyone must who analyses intergovernmental relations as competitive relationships. But even if the clause has meaning, it cannot be made operational. That is why, when needed, it will be used as a competitive instrument in government-to-government relations.

One can gain some insight into what is likely to happen by imagining that the 1867 British North America Act had instructed the government of Ontario to "promote the distinct identity" of that province. It is not too far-fetched to assume that the United Empire Loyalists' version of Britishness made up the distinct character of Ontario at that time. It is not too difficult to imagine, either, some of the things which a constitutional instruction would have instigated as supplemental to the things—not all of them "nice"—which were actually done to forestall the forces which, over the last half century or so, have operated to effectively extinguish the British character of the province.

Like Ontario of yesteryear, Quebec is now undergoing a radical demographic revolution which will in the foreseeable future make the province into a multicultural, multiethnic and multiracial society in which the descendants of the 1763 stock will be absorbed and will dissolve more or less as the United Empire Loyalists have dissolved in Ontario. If the government in Quebec City chooses, as it is possibly instructed to by the Meech Lake Accord, to promote the distinct identity of the 1987 Quebec society—the society of those whose genotype can be traced to 1763—imagine the attacks to which Ottawa will be subjected when legislating for what is instead of what has been; and imagine the flow of litigation challenging the provincial government that will come to the Supreme Court from all corners of the province, including, obviously, from the new Canadians who will make up the new Quebec.

There is irony in what the accord has done. It has generated a context in which the Supreme Court of Canada—a federal body with a built-in constitutionally entrenched two-thirds anglophone majority—will have the task of defining in what sense Quebec is a "distinct society," and whether this or that measure "promotes the distinct identity of Quebec." Irony there is, but there is more. The accord, if it becomes law, will have created a device—in French we would say "un dispositif"—that would make it possible for the Supreme Court's legitimacy to be undermined in Quebec.

Let me turn to my final point. In June of last year I argued on the radio network of Radio Canada that the Meech Lake Accord, if implemented, would be a godsend to any separatist government in Quebec. Mr. Hugh Segal, who was on the air with me, said that separatism was dead. There is probably less certainty on the matter now that Jacques Parizeau has reappeared, but, even if Parizeau does not succeed, the best assumption must be that separatism will return to Quebec at some time. It has cyclically manifested itself throughout the twentieth century, and every time more vigorously and more broadly based than the time before. It may not re-emerge often in the future, because, as Quebec becomes multicultural and multiethnic, the hard core irredentistes, which have always provided the soil in which separatism germinated and first blossomed, will be washed away. But it could return once or twice before that happens. In any case, it would be folly to assume anything else in designing a constitution.

After Meech Lake, an optimal strategy—but only an example of an optimal strategy—for a separatist government in Quebec, or, for that matter, anywhere in the country, would have two components. The first would be to appoint hard-bitten separatists to the Senate. That could be achieved quite rapidly by the simple device of offering choice appointments elsewhere to incumbent senators from Quebec. The stage would then be set for the separatists to stay the business of Parliament. The second component of an optimal separatist strategy would be to refuse to appoint anyone to the Supreme Court while sending case upon case to that body. In a short time the legitimacy of the central judicial machinery would have been undermined.

It must be stressed that what the Parti Québécois government of René Lévesque tried to achieve while in power was essentially to sabotage the legitimacy of the federal government in Quebec. It did not succeed and, as a consequence, separatism made one of its periodic exits. It is disturbing that just a few years after the defeat of the Parti Québécois Canada's First Ministers—one must assume acting in full lucidity—designed a mechanism which Lévesque would not have dreamt ever to have at his disposal, but which he would have used to great effect if he had.

Where should we go from here? I hope I have made clear that if the accord is implemented Canada will lose. It is also a fact that if it is not enacted the reaction in Quebec is likely to be such that Canada will also lose.

The vibes one detects from Ontario's Queen's Park to the effect that the accord must be signed as it stands, but amended in the shortest time afterwards, is a response to this dilemma as well as a back-handed and aberrant way of acknowledging that the accord contains one or possibly more egregious errors, which the First Ministers agreed should cause it to be reopened. After reflection and discussion, I have come to the view that what I detect to be Ontario's response is unacceptable.

If the accord cannot be reopened for amendment, it should be killed. There will be a bad reaction in Quebec, but the re-emergence of Mr. Parizeau should be a guarantee, over the short term, that neither Mr. Bourassa nor those of his ministers who, like him, in the past have shown separatist proclivities will be able to raise the political temperature in Quebec. It is probably the only occasion that we will have to be grateful to the Parti Québécois.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Professor Breton. My first questioner is Senator Marsden.

Senator Marsden: I would first like to thank Professor Breton for such a clear and definitive statement. Professor, I want to go back to your dissenting or minority statement to the Macdonald commission report, especially with respect to executive federalism. You wrote this statement before we had even heard of Meech Lake and before, I think, Mr. Bourassa had presented his five points to the First Ministers in Edmonton, although, presumably, after the Beige Paper in Quebec. In that report, having argued why executive federalism is a problem, you said:

For this reason I believe it is important that federal-provincial consultation on virtually all matters follows, not precedes, debate in the House of Commons and in provincial parliaments. Parliamentary debate should extend to a specification of the areas which could be reasonably coordinated and those which should not be.

Could you amplify your views in that statement with respect to the process and in relation to what we are now faced with, should this accord go forward, as to the future constitutional agenda—fisheries, Senate reform, and so on?

Professor Breton: The only thing I would add to what I have said in the past on this matter is that, first, the procedure should be more open. People should have a chance to voice their views. There should be public debate that precedes instead of follows agreements.

In the case of Meech Lake, for example, it would have been easy for the federal government to say that it was interested in considering seriously the five conditions of Quebec, as spelled out by Mr. Gilles Rémillard, and then in allowing a big discussion throughout the country. The way in which the debate should be structured and the business of Parliament should be structured on this is really beyond my competence, but I would say that the important thing is to open the debate so that there is the benefit of input on the part of a large number of people who are willing and seriously want to make a positive contribution to the solution of an issue that they take to be a problem.

With respect to all matters that will come up now if Meech Lake goes through, every year we are going to have a constitutional conference. It becomes a very complicated matter to think through, but I think that one has to think of a process whereby every year we will not be saddled with enormous constitutional amendments in which no one really participates except the First Ministers.

Senator Marsden: If I could pursue that one further step, you commented in your opening remarks this afternoon that the effect of 1981 and 1982 was to bring the Canadian people into the constitutional process. As you and everyone else knows, the women of Canada fought a major battle to be part of that process in 1981 and 1982 and to have rights protected in the Charter. It was a very painful struggle.

This time we find that when people concerned about the rights of women made presentations before the joint committee, first, the members of the committee completely failed to understand the points—at least, that appeared to be so on the evidence of their responses—and, second, they both misinterpreted and then dismissed those points in the report of the joint committee. If that is an example of opening up the discussion, even though the timing was wrong, do you have any views on how we are going to do any better on the question of fisheries or Senate reform?

Professor Breton: No, not really. May I just say on this point that, although I am grateful to the Senate for these hearings and for listening to Canadians voicing their views, we must all acknowledge that this is more or less a cul de sac. Nobody has the great impression that somebody out there is listening—somebody who really wants to transform the Meech Lake Accord and to make some amendments which, in my view, would be quite easy to do. This process, therefore, is one whereby we debate between ourselves.

Canadians are learning more and more about becoming a constitutional people as a result of what is going on in the country, and this is true, in particular, among the intellectual classes, if you will. There is a seminar every month at the University of Toronto on the Meech Lake Accord—which is very funny, because, in a way, academics never thought that anyone except those connected with the law would be talking constitutional matters.

But, again, the reason why I think that the joint committee was not able to take anything very seriously—you mentioned the women's groups—was essentially because you are faced with a situation where you cannot reopen, you cannot amend. You have put yourselves in a situation where listening is just a formal act; it is not something that is real. I think the important thing is that we put ourselves in a situation where listening to Canadians is genuine.

Senator Marsden: With respect, the Prime Minister and the premiers said that they did not want to reopen it. Those are 11 Canadians. You are telling us that the other millions are part of the constitutional process. Why are all of the members of the Ontario Legislature, the Quebec Legislature and the House of Commons—who presumably are also Canadians in this process—being so compliant on this? Is it the process? Is it party discipline? Is it charismatic leadership? How are we going to get out of this?

Professor Breton: First, I would say that I do not think that Canadians are that compliant. There is quite a bit of opposition and, in a way, it is growing. But, at the same time, you must recognize that even though Canadians think that they have a role to play, and seek a voice in the process, in terms of procedure they do not have any; and I think that is really where the matter lies.

Senator Frith: Professor, there are two points on which I have questions. I want to pursue this very important question about the process, because you know that the reservations that you have about the process are shared by many people. We know that is so from reading comments in this forum and others. I wonder if you have had a look at the sections—I assume you have—in Part V, headed "Procedure for Amending Constitution of Canada." I assume that that is what gave rise to your reservations about the system.

Do I understand that you think that we should make some amendment to provide for a different method other than what has become known as executive federalism or manifestation of executive federalism? Let me explain why I ask you that. I get the feeling when I read sections 38 through to 50—that is, all of Part V—that the drafters of the amendments did not really think about how it would work in fact. Put yourself, for example, in the position of the Prime Minister. He wants to make amendments to the Constitution. If he goes to Part V, it simply says that the amendments can take place by proclamation where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and resolutions of the legislative assemblies. So clearly there is contemplated an initiating resolution either from the Senate or the House of Commons or one of the legislatures; and then, in their turn and separately, they have to pass their necessary resolutions.

Is it not reasonable to expect anyone who is going to initiate an amendment to call together all of the other partners and discuss it with them? Would you agree that it would at least be reasonable to go that far—or do you think that he should just sort of toss it into the ring?

Professor Breton: No. I would say that what is formally in the text could probably be accommodated to a genuine procedure of opening up. You can make the case that what has been agreed upon at Meech Lake, so far as the amending procedure is concerned, is an improvement on what we have had.

However, if every constitutional amendment is going to be made by First Ministers, who sign a document and then agree that it will not be reopened unless there are egregious errors, then that is like closing the thing up, because, in a way, we all know that First Ministers do not make egregious errors; they may not even make errors of any kind.

Senator Frith: Not ones that they would admit to!

Professor Breton: Not ones that they would admit to. Consequently, you can reclose the procedure that way. If, in fact, the genuine parliamentary machinery were at work at the present time, where essentially the First Ministers will have agreed that after hearings and after debate in each of their local parliaments or assemblée nationale they will come back and try to discern a consensus among Canadians, and, in fact, contemplate seriously some amendments, we would have a more open machinery, I agree.

Senator Frith: Could you tolerate the thought of actually putting into the amending formula the requirement for public hearings by the legislatures involved in the operation?

Professor Breton: Personally, I would like that very much, yes. I really believe that it would be a tremendous improvement. I really think that over the years, in the future, we will be forced to this. I think the interest in these matters will grow, and judgments like the one by the Supreme Court on abortion constitutionalizes Canadians to a degree which we could not imagine when we look at our past. Consequently, the pressure will come from these things, and the more that we go ahead and open it up the easier it will be.

Senator Frith: Do you agree that the only way to guarantee opening it up would be to have something requiring hearings, some wording that required the legislatures involved in the process to have hearings?

Professor Breton: Yes, I agree.

Senator Frith: That will be a form of constitutional conference—that is, the kind that has sometimes been proposed, an Estates General kind of thing—which you are not suggesting here, but which would involve the hearing process that you think should be included.

Professor Breton: Yes.

Senator Frith: I want to ask you a question on your point that the present Meech Lake Accord, if enshrined in the Constitution, would be a great political instrument for separatism. Is that a fair way to put it?

Professor Breton: Yes.

Senator Frith: I thought you put it very dramatically, and not simply academically; so I thank you for thinking through the actual hard-edged concrete political steps that could be taken in order to bring that about. I have in mind that some separatists have in fact agreed with you publicly; they have said that this would make separatism easier—that it would make a separate sovereign association or separate Quebec state easier. Am I right about that, or do you know?

Professor Breton: I did not hear anything. The only thing that I was aware of is that essentially the separatists reacted against the Meech Lake Accord. It is my understanding that they reacted against the Meech Lake Accord essentially because it brings Canada within the constitutional family, a symbolic act which they do not like. But I doubt that they have looked at the guts of the accord to come to that judgment. It is just that they do not like it.

Senator Frith: I heard that Mr. Morin had said this, and I wondered whether you, being a professor, had noted that—but if you didn't then that's fine.

Professor Breton: No, I didn't.

The Chairman: I now have Senator Grafstein, followed by Senator Gigantès.

Senator Grafstein: Professor, we welcome you. I recall reading a footnote or an article of yours many years ago dealing with a Charter of Rights, written by the former Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I think he gave you credit for some of his ideas in an article that he wrote in 1955. Am I going back too far in history?

Professor Breton: My memory is dim on that, but it is possible.

Senator Grafstein: So your interest in Charter issues goes back three decades, if that is correct. Let me deal with the major argument that was made by premiers, who are not happy with the compromise, but who said that our nation was built on compromise and therefore this was the only acceptable compromise to, in effect, bring Quebec into the Charter. The argument was made that had the government chosen not to propose this compromise we would have national paralysis. In effect, a third of the country would have been unrepresented in the political forums of the nation. For example, Quebec would not participate in conferences dealing with international trade obligations. In effect, Quebec would opt out by its conduct and by its attitude, and it would cause the reverse of what you suggest the separatists might do—that is, they would paralyze by not participating. What do you recommend the Senate do to deal with this issue? We have not heard the voices in Quebec as we did in the debate over separatism. We have not heard the federalist voices in Quebec on this issue. With the passing of the Prime Ministership of Mr. Trudeau we have not heard strong federalist voices in Quebec giving us the other side of this coin. How are we in the Senate to deal with this issue? I have heard debate on the issue, but I have not heard any acceptable political argument as yet from Quebecers.

• (1530)

Professor Breton: Are you asking me to put myself in the frame of mind where we are amending the document?

Senator Grafstein: We are now confronted with a fait accompli. The question is: Can we now amend without returning to the alleged “paralysis” of Quebec opting out by not participating? In the first place, was there a paralysis?

Professor Breton: I do not know if there was a paralysis. I do not know whether Quebec would have formally stayed out of federal-provincial matters or whether it would have continued to play the game. I think there was a genuine desire on the part of Mr. Bourassa and his government to solve the problem. The general approval of the Meech Lake Accord in the province of Quebec is a reflection of the fact that Quebecers want to be inside the Canadian constitutional family.

Where do we go now? Essentially, the most serious issue to me is the “distinct society” clause. I have often discussed this matter with people at seminars and other kinds of meetings. Some have said that there will never be separatism in Quebec again, that it will not re-emerge. But if Quebec says, “We are going to play the game differently than we have played it in the past. We are still going to compete one with the other, and we are still going to struggle, but whenever it appears that we are not winning on a particular issue we will just pull our marbles out of the game”; I would say that the document is not very good. It is not the best that we can do. For example, the document contains a lot more than Quebec was asking for.

However, as to your question of where do we go from here, I have to say that I really do not know. I really do not know how to deal with the issue. It is really a procedural fault of the first order that we cannot amend. We are placed in the position where, if we say “no”, in a way we are saying “no” to the federalist forces in Quebec, or to those who are not genuinely interested in separatism. I know that prophets are not always welcome and that they have been wrong in the past. However, it appears to me at the present time that we will not see separatism around for a while. The chances of Parizeau being successful, I think, are very dim. However, if Mr. Parizeau is able to constitute the opposition, there will be two parties, the Liberal Party and the Parti Québécois. One day, merely through the evolution of the political process, separatism will reappear.

Would it be best to make amendments now? I really do not know. I really have no answer to your question. We are really in a fix. We have put ourselves in the box, where to say no—and my colleagues and I at the University of Toronto have debated this a great deal—would be a terrible thing at this point in time, because it will be badly taken in Quebec, even by people who do not give great emphasis to constitutional matters. It will be seen as a rejection of Quebec, and it will be exploited as such. So what can we do in the event? Perhaps we could propose something else where the five conditions suggested by Quebec are immediately accepted. The five conditions of Mr. Remillard could easily be accepted. I do not think we would have any problems with them.

Senator Grafstein: I have one final question with respect to the constitutional impasse of the endless agenda. There is now a constitutional agenda, which we have never had in the past. For instance, Senate reform has been put on an endless constitutional agenda, which could be either a positive or a negative force with respect to any other issue if there is not concurrence for change on the issue. In your experience, have we ever had such a comparative constitutional situation before, where a constitutional agenda has been fixed by the Constitution in the sense that we now need unanimity to remove Senate reform or other items from the agenda?

Professor Breton: The clause requiring constitutional meetings every year is really an aberration in terms of thinking about constitutions. You just do not force yourself to amend the Constitution or to consider constitutional matters every year. As I have tried to say, a constitution's primary function is to enhance the political stability of the country. Stability requires that things be put aside, that things be allowed to accumulate, and once in a while you do something about them. By the way, Quebec did not ask for this clause. We do not know how it got into the accord. But that every year the 11 First Ministers will have to consider constitutional matters I find abhorrent, totally abhorrent, and any such revision or amendment should be removed.

Perhaps there should be an economic meeting every year. It does not strike me as a good idea that it be constitutionally required, but I could live with that item. There are always economic problems.

The Chairman: I have four more names on my list. I shall have to cut the list off now or we will not be able to stay within our time limit. I ask that the four senators be concise in their questioning.

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Chairman, I have a factual question pertaining to the witness's text. I am not sure I heard you right, but I believe, at the very end, you said that because of Mr. Parizeau's emergence Mr. Bourassa cannot become more nationalistic. Would you read that last bit again, or tell me what you meant by it?

Professor Breton: It is not a very profound political analysis, and it may be all wrong. Essentially, suppose the accord is removed from the agenda. It cannot be amended, so it is killed off. Mr. Parizeau decides to make political capital from this action. Mr. Bourassa will be forced to adopt the political strategy of distancing himself from Mr. Parizeau, and, even though he may feel bad about it, he will, if straws are thrown at him such as what I was suggesting to Senator Grafstein a few moments ago—that the will of the First Ministers is to keep on working on the five conditions—have to use these straws and begin speaking of a new process. Otherwise, Mr. Bourassa could make such statements as, "It is very hard for us to live in Canada," and so on.

Senator Gigantès: Do you not think that the latter possibility is more likely, because it gives him the opportunity to push his opponents farther off the field, so to speak?

● (1540)

Professor Breton: Perhaps it would, senator.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Gigantès. Senator Le Moyne is next, followed by Senator MacEachen.

[Translation]

Senator Le Moyne: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Professor Breton, have you by any chance read or perhaps examined Bill C-93, an Act for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada?

Professor Breton: No, I have not examined this bill.

Senator Le Moyne: Are you aware of its general intent?

Professor Breton: Yes.

Senator Le Moyne: Would you agree that I myself and others with me are right to be concerned about the possible consequences of this bill, if it were to come into effect, considering our two official languages and their status under the Meech Lake Accord?

What kind of consequences could we expect? How disruptive could this legislation be? Could we expect to have three or four official languages in Canada twenty or twenty-five years from now?

Professor Breton: Senator, personally I have always had a number of reservations, not about multiculturalism as such, since Canada is a multicultural country, and I hope it will remain so, but about multiculturalism as an official policy of the government, as a phenomenon structured and fostered by the government.

When I was a member of the Applebaum-Hébert Commission on Arts and Culture, we met many multicultural groups.

My position at the time, and I have not abandoned it since, was and is that basically, multicultural groups are cultural and as such should be dealt with through Canada's cultural institutions such as the Canada Council. They should not be structured autonomously within the government machine. The dangers you mention, including the splinter effect it might have on our country, and there are many others I could name, are still a very real threat. These groups can go in either direction, especially when they become rather substantial. In fact, they could go anywhere at all. They might start promoting a third or fourth official language, which would make the administration of this country far more difficult than it is at the present time.

Consequently, I am in favour of supporting multiculturalism, but always through our cultural agencies.

Senator Le Moyné: I certainly hope that someday, you will publish a thorough study of this bill which I see as a new mechanism for the balkanization of Canada, whether we like it or not. Thank you, Professor Breton.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator MacEachen is next, followed by Senator Robichaud.

Senator MacEachen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Professor Breton, I want to ask you whether you will elaborate on how you think the concept of the "distinct society" could be used by the Government of Quebec, as you put it, as an instrument of competition in intergovernmental relations or in extending the authority of the Province of Quebec in the economic field. I ask the general question first, and then perhaps I will give you a faulty illustration and ask you to comment on it. However, if you would give me a general answer, I would appreciate it.

Professor Breton: Essentially, the concept being undefined and undefinable, it can be used virtually in every domain in terms of the promotion of what will be defined by any government in Quebec at any time as being within its purview. For example, things that are marginally economic or cultural. However, the whole area of cultural industries could easily be used by a government of Quebec as a vehicle for saying: "We cannot go along with Ottawa on this particular matter; we must promote our own."

I can even see trouble arising with respect to such institutions as Radio Canada; I can see problems arising in matters that have to do with such mundane things as the generation of electricity. In a different world than the one we are apparently about to enter, it could have repercussions in terms of the tariffs that Quebec wants with respect to certain things that it deems to be terribly important for Quebec.

Consequently, every time Quebec wins on one of these matters, even though each of these matters might be very small, while it does not increase the separateness of Quebec, it increases the perception which becomes more and more real as time goes by that Quebec really does not need Ottawa in order to govern itself; that essentially, in all matters that have to do with economics, with culture and with everything else, it is able to do everything.

Perhaps we should look at the relationship of the "distinct society" clause to what has been tried within the last 15 or 20 years with enormous success in Canada, and that has been to give an incredibly important role to Ottawa in terms of the promotion of the culture of francophones in Canada, as well as in Quebec. I see Ottawa playing a very important role, and I think the history over the last 20 years shows that Ottawa can do, and has done, a great deal.

However, I suspect that in the future, any time that some groups in Quebec find it to be in their interest to argue that certain things should be done in Quebec, they can use that "distinct society" clause to try to prevent the central government from pursuing its own actions in matters of culture, economics, or in virtually all matters that can come forward.

Senator MacEachen: When I first entered Parliament, Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister. One of the issues that was frequently discussed at that time by us Members of Parliament was the dairy policy. It was often a contentious issue, particularly when there were requests to increase the support for the dairy farmers.

I remember one time Mr. St. Laurent saying: "Of course, in Quebec the preservation of the dairy farmer is essential; it is part of Quebec." I think that was right. Perhaps it has changed a great deal since then; maybe the proportion of Quebec farmers who make their living on a dairy farm is reduced. Certainly, I am not putting this example forward as a perfect one, but, if, for example, a federal government in Canada acted to reduce or eliminate support for the dairy farmers in Quebec, would the "distinct society" clause be a possible way of attempting to strike against the development of such a policy? It is not that I am recommending such action; I am merely asking whether the "distinct society" has the expansibility to affect the economic field and have an impact upon the formation of economic policy, even with respect to a particular industry.

It is clear, for example, that in Europe the politicians of France would argue that the preservation of the dairy farmer is essential to the wellbeing of France. It would seem to me that, in this competitive relationship, the "distinct society" provision could have very important economic application, and I think you are the first economist we have heard talking expertly about the Meech Lake Accord. I wonder if you could tell me whether or not I am in the right ballpark in making this argument.

Professor Breton: Senator MacEachen, I think you are absolutely in the right ballpark. Whatever the accord does in terms of law, the "distinct society" clause is going to become part of the jargon of politics in Quebec. That clause will be used on all issues, whether they are closely related or only very remotely related to the distinctness of Quebec, precisely because nobody knows what makes the distinct character of a society.

I very seldom follow what is going on in the press in Quebec, but Ramsey Cook of the Department of Political Sciences, University of Toronto, who gave a seminar last week, brought forward a huge amount of literature produced since the Meech Lake Accord. In this literature people are arguing about what they will be able to do with the "distinct society" clause.

Already there is a great deal of literature from people who see in that clause the capacity for obtaining more from Ottawa than they ever thought possible. Any subject under the sun is going to become a proper subject for contention, because everything that you want to define as a characteristic of Quebec will be definable within the terms of this concept.

In previous years this clause would possibly have been used by the Quebec government to legislate the church with respect to the practice of religion. This clause would be used to pass legislation not only vis-à-vis Ottawa but inside Quebec to structure the relationship of groups within Quebec.

Senator MacEachen: You have said that it will become part of the political jargon. But presumably it will also become part of the constitutional process. We have been told by Senator Murray, for example, that the concept of the "distinct society" will give Quebec greater maneuverability in the courts, because the Constitution must be understood in light of the ability of Quebec to promote and maintain a distinct society. To what extent do you think the political jargon will be validated in the courts?

Professor Breton: I do not know. Who wants to predict what direction the courts will go? It will be part of the political jargon, but it will also be part of the political reality of the relationship between the federal government and Quebec henceforth if it becomes law. The courts may be used to determine which direction to go, but it will become part of the relationship of Quebec with the rest of Canada. You are right to emphasize that it will be not only jargon but it will be political reality.

If the Supreme Court consistently rejects Quebec's view of what constitutes its distinctiveness, you can imagine the problems that will arise in relation to all federal and provincial matters in Canada.

Senator Frith: Professor Breton, do you know if Ramsey Cook, who gave evidence before the provincial legislative committee, brought forward this material that you are talking about?

Professor Breton: I do not know, senator.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Senator Robichaud will be the last one to ask questions.

Senator Robichaud: Professor Breton, your answers to all questions were very clear. However there is one answer which I may have misunderstood, an answer to a question from Senator Grafstein.

[English]

As I understood what you said earlier, Quebec received a lot more than it expected to receive. Could you enumerate what Quebec asked for and what Quebec received that the other provinces did not receive under the Meech Lake Accord?

Professor Breton: No, I could not do that. From memory I cannot repeat the five things that M. Remillard asked for. However, to give you an example of one of the things that M. Remillard asked for, in the preamble to the Constitution he asked that Quebec be recognized as a distinct society. The Quebec government would have been satisfied with that.

If I recall the discussions around 1981-82, the federal government was willing to give that to Quebec at that time. There may be problems with wording and problems with constitutional negotiations, but there is no great problem in writing in the preamble of the Constitution that Quebec is a distinct society.

The only problem that I can see is that there are a large number of other groups in society that would want to be recognized as distinct, and they may ask to be recognized as distinct in that part of the Constitution. My point is that Quebec did not want its distinctive character to become an interpretative clause in the Constitution. I do not know the process that brought that about, but Quebec was not asking for a constitutional conference every year. I do not know how that came to be in the bargaining, but, clearly, it came out of the bargaining process.

Senator Frith: Or appointments to the Senate.

Professor Breton: Or appointments to the Senate, for that matter, and things of that kind.

Senator Robichaud: Outside of Quebec becoming a distinct society, did Quebec receive more than what they expected to receive from the Meech Lake Accord? I am not talking about the other provinces.

Professor Breton: I do not know what they expected, but they received more than they had asked for, yes.

Senator Robichaud: What are the items that they received?

Professor Breton: With respect to the "distinct society" clause, Quebec received more than they wanted. In the preamble to the Constitution, they wanted to be recognized as a distinct society. We then included that clause in the Constitution as the basis on which to interpret the whole of it.

Senator Robichaud: Besides that clause, did they receive any more than any of the other provinces?

Professor Breton: I do not think so. Except for the "distinct society" clause that touches Quebec specifically, my memory right now is that nothing else specifically touches Quebec.

Senator Frith: There is the matter of immigration.

Professor Breton: Yes, immigration.

Senator Frith: They simply asked for a greater provincial role in immigration, but they got more than the other provinces got.

Senator Robichaud: But they had asked for that. That was one of their requests.

Senator Frith: They asked for a provincial role. They did not ask for a special role for themselves, but they got a special role for themselves; is that not right?

Professor Breton: Yes, that is true.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Robichaud. There are others who wish to ask questions and I had some questions myself, Professor Breton, but we will have to forgo those, because our time has passed.

[Translation]

Thank you so much for coming here today and for expressing your ideas.

Professor Breton: I do thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: Our next witness is Doctor Hugh Allan Cairns, Professor of Political Sciences at the University of British Columbia. Once again, everyone has received Professor Cairn's personal resume.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Professor Hugh Allan Cairns was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Professor Cairns, normally we proceed with a 15- or 20-minute presentation by the witness and then ask questions. We have a total of one hour at our disposal.

• (1600)

Since we did not receive a text from Professor Cairns, we will be operating without one.

If you are ready, please proceed.

Professor Hugh Allan Cairns, Department of Political Science, University of British Columbia: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was informed by the Clerk that a written text was not necessary. So I apologize if I am in error in my understanding.

The Chairman: You are not the least bit in error. You are quite welcome without a text.

Professor Cairns: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have had the good fortune of listening to some of Professor Breton's presentation. I am not sure whether to be chagrined or pleased that we are in agreement on certain important aspects of the Meech Lake issue.

In thinking about my presentation it seemed to me there were two approaches the various presenters to this committee and to the joint committee had adopted, one was to make a case for what should be done to improve the Meech Lake Accord, to modify it, to amend it, and so forth. That, naturally, is the approach that most of the interest groups which appeared before the joint committee and, I assume, before this committee, have adopted, because they have particular interests which they feel are jeopardized by the accord.

My preferred approach is to try to make sense of where we are in constitutional terms. This, I think, is more properly the task of the academic, and I find the Meech Lake Accord does, in a sense, bring together an understanding of constitutional development which rather deeply disturbs me. So, I thought I would address, in a sense, the cause of my disturbance.

My basic position is that we have now in the Constitution a profound incoherence or contradiction. This exists at the heart of our constitutional existence, and I really think that it is the task of this committee and of opinion leaders and others over the next several years to address that incoherence or contradiction. This incoherence or contradiction is manifest, I believe, in the profound anger, sense of outrage, and so forth, of the many groups that have appeared before the joint committee and this committee. Their anger, in other words, I view not just as the normal anger of interest groups but as a constitutional anger. I think, therefore, their sense of outrage is constitutionally significant.

What it reveals is a dispute about the nature of the Canadian Constitution, about what its relation is to Canadian society, and, to put it differently, about whose Constitution it is.

For what we might call "Meech Lakers"—that is, those who have brought about the Meech Lake Accord, essentially composed of 11 individuals from the ten provincial governments and one federal government—it can be called the "governments' Constitution." The fact that it is the "governments' Constitution" from their perspective I think is fairly self-evident in the process that has been adopted, one dominated by governments primarily meeting in secret, which then announce a constitutional fait accompli which they indicate will not be changed unless egregious errors, which they retain the right to define, are discovered. The perception that the Meech Lake Accord reveals this as being the governments' Constitution is also quite explicit in various statements made by the current federal government. According to the federal government, in a position paper it released on Meech Lake, the task of public participation in presumably this and other committees is "to explore the implications of the Constitutional Amendment, 1987 so it is well understood by everyone, and in so doing to influence the future agenda in the annual rounds of constitutional discussions which are to take place."

So, quite clearly, the perspective of the leading actors is that the governments possess the Constitution, it is theirs to change, and it is for others to be in the audience.

This government domination of the amending process presupposes, I think, that the written Constitution is mainly about federalism, and federalism is mainly an affair of governments. Before 1982 this might have been a reasonably accurate perspective; it might have been a reasonably valid statement of a condition of affairs which most Canadians would have accepted. Since 1982 that is no longer a valid position, it seems to me, and that, of course, is also what Professor Breton was asserting in his earlier presentation to you.

What seems to have happened is that the Constitution Act of 1982, and in particular the Charter, has produced an alternative vision of the Constitution. I call this—and I am not sure the phrase is exactly right, but it does serve to highlight the difference from the "governments' Constitution"—the "citizens' Constitution." And what has happened, of course, is that the Charter has brought new groups into the constitutional order, new individuals, new leaders of organizations, new social categories of Canadians who have been induced by the Constitution Act of 1982—primarily the Charter, but not exclusively the Charter—to think of themselves in constitutional terms as having a constitutional existence. The illustrations of this are manifold, but they are worth underlining, because I do not think we have yet learned to live with the increasingly complex constitutional arrangement which 1982 has left us as its legacy.

As an example, there is initially, of course, and possibly most clearly, the position of women and section 28 of the Charter. The language that women use in describing their relation to section 28 is remarkably revealing. It seems to me that they describe section 28 as being "their section." An interesting book has been written by one of the participants in the process leading to the recognition of gender and equal treatment in the 1982 Constitution called The Taking of Section 28, which makes the point that the women's movement feels it was responsible, by its political mobilization, for seeing that section 28 has the status it has in the Constitution.

Then there is section 27, which we can call the "multiculturalism section." Here again, to read the presentations of the various groups which have appeared before this and the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is to make it clear that, for them, section 27, mandating the recognition of the multicultural heritage of Canadians, is a constitutional clause towards which they have a certain proprietary attitude. It is their clause; it is their way of saying that Canada is not entirely composed of the two original Charter communities.

Then, of course, we have the aboriginals, who have scattered references throughout the Constitution, some in section 91.24, which reserves jurisdictional authority over Indians and lands reserved for Indians to the federal government, and then in section 25 of the Charter, which refers to the rights of aboriginal peoples, and again in other sections of the Constitution Act.

Then we have the official language minorities, who are singled out for privileged treatment as compared to other linguistic communities in Canada, primarily in section 23.

Then, if we look at section 15, subparagraphs (1) and (2) we see multiple statements about particular categories of Canadians who, in 15(1), are to be accorded equal treatment in a variety of ways listed, and in 15(2), to be eligible, in certain circumstances, for affirmative action, and this includes such groups as the disabled, the visible minorities, and so forth.

What has happened, it seems to me, is that these various social categories have acquired niches in the Constitution. They have achieved for themselves a form of constitutional recognition and, accordingly, they, not unnaturally and not surprisingly, have come to view themselves as constitutional actors, at least in certain particular circumstances. At a minimum, they have come to feel entitled to participate in constitutional changes which might downgrade the status of what they view as "their constitutional clause or clauses."

● (1610)

To me, this means that at the heart of our Constitution we have a clear conflict between what, on the one hand, I have called the governments' Constitution, which is primarily concerned with federalism, and which, in terms of the written British North America Act, might be considered the predominant significance of that earlier version of our written Constitution; on the other hand, we have this citizens' Constitution, which focuses on the Charter and hands out various recognitions to different groups which are not territorially defined. This conflict, then, centres on two important aspects of the Constitution.

First, the conflict contains competing assertions of the role and purpose of the Constitution. From the perspective of the governments' Constitution, the role and purpose of the Constitution remains primarily to regulate the affairs of government, with essential relationship to federalism.

With respect to the citizens' Constitution, this is not so. From the perspective of the citizens' Constitution, the constitutional order regulates relations between citizens and the state and singles out a variety of particular categories for explicit recognition, significant component parts of the Canadian Constitution and society. Second—and it necessarily follows—it generates a conflict as to who should be a legitimate participant in the amending process. To put this differently, what has happened is that we now, in 1988, are caught up in an explicit contradiction that was built into the 1982 Constitution Act, which we are only now beginning to discern with clarity.

On the one hand, there was the Charter that stressed citizens' rights and brought new groups into the overall constitutional order. This, of course, is the basis of the citizens' Constitution. It is also important to keep in mind that the Charter was viewed by those who were its crucial supporters in the federal government to be a significant nation-building instrument. That is, it was to induce Canadians, in addition to protecting their rights against governments, to think of themselves as members of a national community. We also know that the inclusion of the Charter, and in particular the provisions dealing with minority language communities, was the prime objective of the federal government in the 1982 Constitution compromise.

On the other hand, the 1982 Constitution Act has left us with an amending formula which is controlled by governments and is highly protective of government interests. It is important to remember that this amending formula rejects the referendum role for the electorate, which had been part of the original federal government proposals. The amending formula, with some modifications, unlike the Charter, which primarily reflects the pressure of the national government in the 1982 Constitution Act, is a product of what was called "the gang of eight."

So, the 1982 Constitution Act contains a basic contradiction reflecting the political compromise that went into its making. To put it differently, the addition of a significant citizens' component in the Constitution was not reflected in the amending procedure. Accordingly, the future operation of the latter, the amending procedure, was likely, as Meech Lake confirms, to offend the beneficiaries of the former, who might well feel that the part of the Constitution that was theirs was unfairly and illegitimately interfered with by the fact that governments played the key role in the amending formula. This is precisely what has happened in the Meech Lake discussions. Diagnostically, this is why many of the citizens' groups that appeared before this and the joint committee have been so offended and so outraged. I suggest that they experience a sense of constitutional outrage.

In trying to understand this phenomenon we also have to recognize that the Constitution now plays a significantly different role in Canadian society than it formerly did. It is not just an affair of governments mainly dealing with federalism. Even to add to the role of the Charter and say, as is often said, "We have moved from two pillars, federalism and parliamentary government, to three, federalism, parliamentary government and the Charter, and the latter should be thought of as an instrument for the protection of rights," does not encompass the extent of the change which has taken place. I think the Constitution has become, in addition to its regulation of federalism and the role of the Charter in the protection of rights, a significant instrument of what I call "social recognition." By that I mean that it readjusts the official status and public recognition of various social categories of Canadians whose identities are sprinkled through the various clauses of the Charter: women, aboriginals, ethnic groups, various minorities, the disabled, and so on.

As I read the evidence of the groups who presented briefs, the concerns of these social categories and the group that represents them are not strictly instrumental. They are not narrowly utilitarian, and that is why I view this much more eclectic Constitution in terms of its purpose of having become this instrument of social recognition. These groups are now concerned with how they are officially regarded in what is the main public statement of who the important actors are in Canadian society. They are therefore ever watchful when constitutional change threatens to affect detrimentally their relative recognition. We also have to keep in mind that these groups are engaged, to some extent, in competition with each other for the degree of recognition they would like to attain in the Charter or, more generally, in the Constitution.

In summing up, therefore, I think at this time, when the Meech Lake Accord is still being discussed in a number of provincial arenas and in the second chamber of the federal Parliament, that we are in transition from a government-dominated written Constitution concerned with federalism to a mixed Constitution which now has a significant citizens' component. The Charter has generated, in relation to that citizens' component, a participant culture with respect to constitutional change. The groups that were deliberately brought into the Constitution in 1982 are no longer content to be spectators at subsequent bouts of constitutional change. The Meech Lake process, accordingly, seems to me to be out of touch with irreversible developments in the constitutional culture of Canadian citizens.

● (1620)

An annual repetition of the Meech Lake process, which may be implied by the requirement for an annual conference on the Constitution to be dominated by governments, I believe, is a recipe for deepening frustration and alienation at the citizen base of the constitutional order. It threatens, I feel, to delegitimize a Constitution that is no longer the property of the 11 governments of Canadian federcacy.

If I may conclude, Mr. Chairman, I will quote from several paragraphs of a previous paper I wrote, which, I think, sum up my perspective and which, I hope, will not take me over my allotted 15 or 20 minutes.

The conjunction of a growing rights consciousness, the linking to the Constitution of groups who previously had little or no constitutional recognition, and the symbolic power of the Charter have modified the Canadian constitutional order in ways that will take decades to work out. This change goes beyond the conventional assertion that the Supreme Court has acquired an enhanced role as a national policymaker.

An even more profound change is taking place at the citizen base of the constitutional order. Yesterday's deference to governing elites in constitutional matters has been replaced by a resentment when citizens, who think of themselves as constitutional actors, are defined as spectators by governments. In the eyes of many of the group elites for whom this psychological change is most pronounced, and who see their fate as affected by constitutional change, the Constitution is no longer an affair of governments.

In addition to the governments' Constitution, which tends to focus on federalism, there is a citizens' Constitution, which the Charter symbolizes. A central task of the constitutional theory and practice of future decades is to find ways in which these two visions, warring in the bosom of the Canadian Constitution, can be reconciled. The major site for that resolution must be the amending process where, as Meech Lake exemplifies, their incompatibility is most pronounced.

The Meech Lake Constitutional Accord underlines a basic contradiction at the very heart of the Canadian constitutional system. The constitutional division of powers, from which strong interventionist governments have emerged, lends continuing credibility to the thesis that federalism in Canada is about governments. That thesis is reinforced by the executive supremacy which party discipline and the theory of responsible governments sustain. In the intergovernmental arena of constitutional politics, the practice of federal-provincial diplomacy, as the Meech Lake Accord almost exaggeratedly confirms, is the very perfection of governmental hegemony when unanimity of governments can be achieved in private.

However, while federalism may still be largely about governments—and I view this next statement as being very important—federalism itself has lost relative status in the Constitution as an organizing principle. The Constitution is now also about women, aboriginals, multicultural groups, equality, affirmative action, the disabled, a variety of rights, and so on. Since it is not possible to separate clearly the concerns of the governments which dominate federalism from the concerns of these newly constitutionalized social categories, it logically follows that the Constitution, with its many non-federal concerns, can no longer be entrusted exclusively to governments in the process of constitutional change. Government domination of the constitutional process has therefore seriously declined in legitimacy. The intergovernmental bargaining process structures outcomes in terms of one set of cleavages—the federal-provincial. The public hearing process responds in terms of a different set of cleavages. The latter delegitimizes the former.

Those who ran the Meech Lake constitutional show falsely assumed that the Meech Lake agenda could be confined to federalism and, thus, could be dominated by governments with little opposition. The Meech Lake Accord may succeed and the Constitution may be changed accordingly. However, the constitutional contradiction laid there by the Meech Lake process will not go away. It seems to me to be the task of those of us concerned with the Constitution to address that contradiction and to try to reconcile it in the future.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The first questioner on my list is Senator Lucier, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Lucier: Professor Cairns, I found your presentation most interesting. In your opening remarks you ask the question: "Whose Constitution is this?" You were expressing the cause of your concerns about where the accord is taking us.

I represent the Yukon in the Senate, and being from there and taking into account what the Meech Lake Accord does to the two northern territories and to the aboriginal peoples in those two northern territories by leaving them off the agenda and replacing them with fish, you can imagine the indignation of the people of the North.

I would like to deal with one of the items on the permanent agenda until it is solved, which, I have a feeling, may be some time. That item is Senate reform. I thought you, being a westerner, might have some interest in this.

Premier Getty's great achievement for the people of Alberta, it seems to me, was that he was going to get some kind of trade-off in terms of whatever he gave up at Meech Lake. He was going to get some meaningful Senate reform with a triple-E Senate—effective, equal and elected. He managed to get that on the agenda of the constitutional conference. Do you see a possibility of meaningful Senate reform now that we have the unanimity clause applying to Senate reform rather than the seven out of ten and 50 per cent rule?

Professor Cairns: I would have to agree with Senator Forsey, who has said that transitional Senate reform—which we have already proceeded with since one senator from Newfoundland has already been appointed under it, even prior to its having gone through 11 legislatures, which, I must say, strikes me as highly anomalous—is the extent of Senate reform we will get. I think that that is, in a sense, by the back door, unexplained and the purposes for which it was put in were not laid out. It is Senate reform which will have significant consequences for the second chamber, but it is not the Senate reform that Premier Getty and other western groups were aiming for.

[Professor Cairns.]

Senator Lucier: Do the people of western Canada really think that this accord is going to do anything for them in that particular area? It seems to me that they have given up an awful lot in exchange for that. Do you really think they understand what is taking place here?

Professor Cairns: I do not really know. I have no idea what the polls are saying about the Meech Lake Accord and/or about the possibility of Senate reform in these annual constitutional conferences. I simply cannot answer the question.

In terms of British Columbia, one of the difficulties in answering a question such as that is that, although the Meech Lake Accord greatly enhances the role of the provincial governments in the overall operation of Canadian federalism in response to the principle of equality of the provinces, which allows them, in a sense, on the coat tails of Quebec, to get very significant constitutional advantages for themselves, I think it is not an exaggeration to say that there has been zero discussion from the provincial-government perspective of how it views what it has got and how it views what might be the kind of Senate reform which could follow from these annual constitutional conferences. This is one of my frustrations with the whole process.

Take Senate reform, for example. Neither the provincial government nor the federal government has put forward any significant position papers indicating what particular objectives with respect to Senate reform are to be served by this interim constitutional transitional arrangement—and reform is probably the most important change in the structure and composition of the Senate since 1867. I believe I have read everything that has come out in the process, and I can find absolutely nothing that indicates what the present government expects to happen in the existing Senate as a result of a process which is already under way, independently of what might happen—and I do not think much will happen—at the annual constitutional conferences.

Senator Frith: I want to thank Professor Cairns for the very articulate way in which he has made this important distinction between the constitutional context pre- and post-1982. As he has stated, before 1982 the Constitution was the property, in effect, of governments and legislatures, and that after 1982 a totally new dimension was added to the Constitution. I can reinforce what he has said by saying that at law school we were taught that Parliament could do whatever it wanted to do prior to 1982. There was nothing to prevent Parliament from doing anything, including making a man into a woman, as long as it was within its powers under section 91 or within the powers of the provinces under section 92.

Professor, I think your distinction is a good one, and I like the idea of talking about the governments' Constitution and the citizens' Constitution. I like the word "citizen"—it has a nice sort of Tale of Two Cities, Dickensian ring to it, but I am going to respectfully suggest to you that you might modify it somewhat. I hope you do not think my point is nit-picking, but, rather, that it adds, to use your own word, a highlight to your distinction. I make my point because the rights of the "citizen" under the Charter are not as extensive as the rights of "everyone." In making your distinction, using simply "citizens," there could be created the impression that only Canadian citizens have rights under the Charter.

I know that you remember, for example, that under section 2 of the Charter everyone has the fundamental freedoms set out therein. Section 3, which deals with democratic rights, refers to every citizen of Canada; you are quite right. Section 6, which deals with mobility rights, surprisingly enough refers to citizens, not to everyone.

In section 7, which was the principal basis for the Morgentaler decisions, the Charter states that "everyone has the right to life," and so on. Section 8 states that "everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure."

So, while I totally support your position, I ask you to consider modifying it. Sections 9 and 10 refer to "everyone;" section 11 refers to "any person;" and section 12 refers to "everyone." Section 13 refers to "a witness," which could include someone who was not a citizen. Section 14 is the same. Section 15, dealing with equality rights, refers to "every individual." Section 17, which has to do with the official languages of Canada, refers to "everyone" in both subsections. Then on minority language educational rights reference is again made to "citizens." Enforcement is available, under section 24, to "anyone."

I repeat that I think your distinction is important, but I ask you to consider whether it would be better to talk about "the people's Constitution" so that we can reinforce the fact that, particularly under our system where the Queen's "protection" is not limited to citizens, those people who are not citizens still have rights—Charter rights, in particular.

Professor Cairns: I accept your qualification, senator, although I am a little unhappy at the damage it does to my rhetoric. I think the word "citizen" carries a constitutional import that the word "people" does not, and I am trying to identify those rights bearers who are citizens as having roles in the constitutional order. But you are quite right, some do and some do not apply exclusively to citizens.

Senator Marsden: I have a specific question on the distinction made between the governments' Constitution and what I will refer to as the "citizens' Constitution," for the moment. Let me first say that I think, Professor Cairns, that you are one of a very small number of people who have ever understood, or even bothered to try to understand, the events and feelings which caused the women of this country to unite and fight for sections 28 and 15 of the Charter in 1981 and 1982, and which are causing us to do precisely the same thing again. Your view is very much appreciated. What you are telling us is that the 11 ministers have accomplished an old-fashioned coup d'état—the restoration of the monarchy, or in this case the governments' Constitution.

The Deputy Minister of Inter-Governmental Affairs made a presentation on February 2 to the Ontario Select Committee in which he said the following:

On the 17th of April, 1982, flags in Quebec were flown at half mast. In the eyes of many Quebecers, the new amending formula arbitrarily took away the historical constitutional veto of the Government of Quebec and subjected Quebec's future place in the federation to the discretion of the other provinces.

One could interpret that to mean that now it is the Quebec citizens who have a role in the Constitution, to follow your line of analysis, which also suggests a kind of government patronage model—women, aboriginal people, multiculturalism, now Quebec, next fish, the Senate, and on and on it goes. Could you comment on whether you think that is, in effect, what is going on, or is there something quite different going on in terms of the quotation I have just read and the Meech Lake Accord?

Professor Cairns: I am not completely sure I have the focus of your question, senator, but let me try a quick response so as not to consume too much time. If I do not have it, perhaps you can return to the query. One of my own concerns about accepting the phrase "citizens' Constitution" is that there is a way in which it might well be divisive, because particular groups might see themselves as having particular niches or parts of the Constitution that belong to them. Of course, the nation-building purpose of the Charter was to produce a coast-to-coast community of rights-bearing Canadians who would possess individual rights in common. It seems to me that most of the presenters before the joint committee have been there as defenders of particular clauses rather than as defenders of the Charter idea as a whole. Therefore, you get many more people talking about section 27 or section 28 or section 15 than you do about mobility rights or the rights contained in sections 2 to 14. Once we get to equality rights, political interest picks up again.

Possibly behind your question was a concern that I share, if I have the question correctly, that I think we are "ad hocking" it a great deal, and that we really need some kind of political theory or constitutional theory which makes sense of the tremendous amount of constitutional change that we are asking the system and the Canadian people to digest. From that perspective, I think annual constitutional conferences are about the last thing we need right now. I think we need a period of reflection, a period of consolidation, a period of trying to make sense, rather than a continuation of the kind of rhetoric and frantic pace of change which seems to be a response, in many cases, to individual lobbying groups. The way in which section 16 got into the accord, for example, is presumably because two particular communities managed to get access to some government minister between Meech Lake and the Langevin Block. Although, retrospectively, attempts have been made to cover that up with a glossy principle, I think it is ad hoc politicking. I am concerned about a Constitution which gets subjected to so many of those kind of ad hoc interventions by individual groups who are trying to adjust their relative status vis-a-vis each other.

● (1640)

Senator Marsden: So, in your view, this does not resolve the historical problem which is referred to in Professor Cameron's statement about the historical constitutional veto of Quebec, or what Professor Breton said earlier that had been asked for, which is the recognition of "distinct society," in the preamble. If I understand you correctly, you are saying that the Meech Lake Accord neither resolves that historic problem nor avoids the ad hoc problem of creating yet another constituency for the Constitution.

Professor Cairns: All I can say is that Mr. Bourassa seems to view the Meech Lake Accord with the extension of the unanimity principle and with the extension of the compensation principle with respect to the new definition of the spending power to meet Quebec's objections. So I take it that that is a satisfactory response so far as that government is concerned.

Senator Marsden: Do you consider it satisfactory?

Professor Cairns: Well, in terms of meeting that political response, that political demand, yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Professor Cairns, you say that the process by which the Meech Lake constitutional amendment was achieved is now open to a charge—not a conviction but a charge—of illegitimacy. I am interested in the result of the process. Let us say that none of the groups to which you referred feels seriously aggrieved by the result. Would questions be raised about the process; and, to come to the real nub of the question, do you think that there are aspects of the result which, quite aside from the process, could be regarded as illegitimate?

Professor Cairns: I do not really know how one could regard a particular result as illegitimate independently of the process that has produced it—that is, if it is not illegitimate for that process to have taken place, I cannot quite see, unless one has some particular definition of what a constitution must be about in all circumstances and at all times, how one can regard the outcome.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let me put my question in a different way. Let me ask you if you think that, regardless of its legitimacy, the process has had results which are undesirable?

Professor Cairns: I myself regard the overall provincializing thrust of the Meech Lake Accord as undesirable from my perspective of what I think is the way I would like the national government to be constituted, to operate, to have responsibilities, to treat Canadians as members of a national community. I understand, of course, that there are competing visions of what the federal system is all about, but I do not accept that the Meech Lake Accord is a kind of pendulum response to the centralist nature of the 1982 Constitution Act, because I view the 1982 Constitution Act as a compromise in which there were significant provincial elements and significant central government elements of victory—in the sense of the Charter, not in terms of jurisdiction. So I do not particularly think that any balancing in that sense was required.

[Professor Cairns.]

What seems to have happened is that the other provincial governments used the political power they wielded in the amending process to extract for themselves everything that was granted to Quebec, with the exception of the "distinct society" clause, and with a few other bonuses thrown in for good effect.

What I find unfortunate about that is that there seems to have been no discussion anywhere throughout this whole constitutional process that this significant injection of a provincializing element into the Canadian Constitution is desirable because of various demands from the international, domestic or some other environment. That is, the whole discussion seems to have occurred independently of what the political system is doing or is expected to do in the future. It seems to have been entirely a contained internal response to a problem in the federal system of the non-signature of Quebec, which was politically important, as that response got worked out through the bargaining power of the other nine provincial governments in a context in which the federal government, for whatever reason, did not come with a competing vision of a national community which could have produced some sort of compromise, as in 1982.

Why that did not happen I do not know. Perhaps it could not have happened given the genesis of the demands from the Government of Quebec. I do not have an answer to that. But it does seem to me to be a one-sided response, for which Canadians in the future might pay the price, and which they have not been told they will pay.

Senator MacEachen: Professor Cairns, I will begin by thanking you for your intensely interesting presentation, in which you brought to our attention the citizens' Constitution, so to speak, and the proposition that the citizen had not been able to participate in the formulation of the constitutional proposals. That suggests to me two thoughts on which I would like you to comment.

The first is that following the development of the constitutional proposals the House of Commons has dealt with them, approved them, and certainly they are the best representatives that we know of the citizens. Likewise, all of the provincial legislatures will have to deal with the constitutional proposals—vote them down or accept them—and here again, presumably, the legislatures will be sensitive to the citizen point of view. So my question is: Does that not mitigate to some extent your concern about lack of citizen participation?

The second part of my question is: What has happened to the outraged constitutionalists in our society, and what are they going to do about their outrage? They have probably lost the opportunity insofar as the House of Commons is concerned, but they have the opportunity in at least six or seven of the legislatures which have not yet approved the constitutional text.

For example, in my own province the legislature has not yet dealt with the constitutional text. However, there will be no legislative committee. The government will put forward the resolution and get it passed as quickly as possible. But what I find disturbing is that the citizens themselves do not seem to be enraged to the point where they can bring influence even on provincial legislatures, which I think is somewhat easier than bringing it on the Parliament of Canada. Your province of British Columbia is part of the process. I ask you to comment. It seems that there is in the country, even among the outraged constitutionalists, a reluctance on the part of the citizenry to exercise their responsibility within their own provinces with respect to the Meech Lake Accord.

Professor Cairns: In a sense, your latter comment answers your first question—should we not be satisfied that the matter does have to go through the ten provincial legislatures and the two federal legislative bodies, and has already received the support of some. For a variety of reasons—one of which, I suppose, relates to electoral prospects in the province of Quebec—it seems to me that the lining up of both opposition parties, through their leaders, at least, and the federal government, or the Conservative incumbent party behind the Meech Lake Accord, has made it quite difficult for dissenters to make their grievances known. A negative by-product of the unity of the three major parties in the House of Commons has been that the inquisitive aggressiveness, which often, by exploration, peels back some of the negative aspects of an activity of government in any sphere, simply has not taken place. So I think there has been a certain “bottling-up” of information, which has deprived those who might otherwise be concerned, outraged citizens, of resources which they might use to intervene.

The fact that not all parts of this agreement were subject to unanimity in terms of the 1982 amendment, but were treated as if they were subject to unanimity, in a way, does a disservice to the cause of having information about the process disclosed to the general public, because since all 11 First Ministers agreed in two meetings in private to put the accord to their legislatures in the context of party discipline—and in most provinces there will be no public hearings—there has not been a great deal of publicity about the Meech Lake Accord. In some provinces, such as British Columbia, the citizenry has been left in the situation of—and I do not know whether or not it is benign—relative ignorance. So, except for the efforts of those few groups who have managed to get mobilized to appear before the joint committee and before this Senate Committee of the Whole, the recognition of some of the negative features of the accord have not been drawn to public attention. For example, it is only very recent—the ink is almost still fresh—that the volume by Bryan Schwartz, called “Fathoming Meech Lake”, a publication of the Legal Research Institute of the Faculty of Law of the University of Manitoba, was published. It is extremely disquieting. I would say that it is a devastating criticism of the Meech Lake Accord both in terms of process and of substance. The book has only been available for a couple of weeks, because it is not easy for individuals to mount comprehensive critics of the second most significant constitutional change we have experienced in our history. So some people such as Bryan Schwartz, who, I gather, played some kind of role as an adviser to the Manitoba delegation, have done what they view as their mix of citizen and academic duty and pointed out what they think are problems with Meech Lake.

I suppose what others will do, if the Meech Lake Accord does go through, is try to put the pieces together after the fact and see what can be salvaged. That is, they will argue with respect to Supreme Court appointments, for example, that conceivably the federal government could say, “All future nominees for Supreme Court appointments will be referred by us to this committee composed of the following representatives from the Canadian Bar Association, citizen groups, etc.” That is, we may get various responses after the fact to try to restore some elements of constitutional order which they think have been damaged by this process. One other response might be to try to make sure that the annual conference on the Constitution does not turn into an annual recipe for ongoing provincialization, that we do not get annual Meech Lake Accords.

I think this process of the accord is only justified, if at all, as an extraordinary response to an extraordinary situation. I wish the federal government had so defined the accord that we could then take it out of the stream of precedent. Instead, they seem to be saying that this is the preferred way of changing the Constitution from now on, which I find deeply disturbing, primarily because I view constitutional change in the same way as judicial decisions which should involve judge and company. I think constitutional change should involve governments and company, so to speak, and the “and company” includes the citizenry, constitutional commentators in the academic community, and so on. These people cannot do their job if they are not provided with the raw resources of public explanation by governments of what they are trying to achieve. We have not been provided with those resources this time, so it is extremely difficult for us to engage in dialogue, because the government, aside from the important fact that they are bringing Quebec into the constitutional family, has not levelled with us on the probable consequences of particular clauses and what they think they will do to the Constitution. They have not done this, so it is very hard for us to debate with them. We should try to insist that in the future governments not be allowed to get away with constitutional change in that irregular fashion—by announcement and fait accompli, and by saying that only egregious errors will be looked at and that they will define them. It is simply unacceptable in an old political system such as ours.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I have one follow-up question.

The Chairman: Would you be very short, Senator MacEachen?

Senator MacEachen: Yes. Eleven governments have not in fact agreed. At least one government has not agreed—the Government of New Brunswick. I cannot say what the Government of New Brunswick will do. However, suppose that this new legislature, which was not involved in the discussions, decides to amend the constitutional accord. The First Ministers cannot dictate that no amendments will take place. If New Brunswick amended the constitutional text, what, in your opinion, would be the next step in this process? In addition, if the Senate of Canada amended the constitutional text, what, in your opinion, would the next step be there? Would the House of Commons have to consider that text? Would the provincial legislatures have to consider it? I raise these points as they have interested me, and I would like your opinion as to what would develop in the event.

Professor Cairns: Some parts of your question are probably better answered by a constitutional lawyer than by a plain political scientist, which is what I am. I would assume that if the Senate of Canada proposes an amendment it only has a delaying power of 180 days, I believe, from the time it receives the resolution.

● (1700)

Senator Frith: I believe that is from the time that the House of Commons passes its resolution.

Professor Cairns: Very well. In any event, there is a time limit. It does not have an actual veto power. It can simply delay the process. It seems to me that if it were to amend, that is simply a public message to other actors in the political system that whatever the change is that you are introducing indicates certain dissatisfaction on the part of the Senate with the Meech Lake Accord, and they will or will not pay attention to that as their political interests and constitutional concerns dictate.

The position of the Government of New Brunswick is quite different in that it does have a veto, as, of course, does the Government of Manitoba, which is the other problematic government because of its slim majority in the house and the difference of opinion held by the New Democratic Party as to the virtues of the Meech Lake Accord.

I suppose that Premier McKenna of New Brunswick, assuming some dissatisfaction with the accord, could either pass an amendment or do something a little bit more innocuous by indicating the specifics of his government's dissatisfaction with the accord, which he would then take back to the bargaining table of the 11 First Ministers to see what changes, if any, could be introduced. If there was a positive response, then he would have achieved his objective; if not, he would then have to decide whether to proceed or not proceed.

I certainly find it unsatisfactory and offensive to be told that one cannot go back to the First Ministers and indicate that some modification of their achievement should be considered by them. There were improvements between Meech Lake and Langevin in that very limited timeframe, which I believe even the Prime Minister has admitted. Therefore, I think there is room for improvement, and if the Senate has concerns it should express those concerns.

What other actors do, I assume, is their choice. New Brunswick can influence the process, because it has a de facto veto. Also, I suppose it is not out of the question that, depending on what parts of the accord New Brunswick's unwillingness to acquiesce might affect, the federal government and the other nine provincial First Ministers might disentangle the accord and remind all Canadians that not all of it really was subject to unanimity; some was, but some was subject only to seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population. Therefore, your objections would be insufficient to kill it if they referred to those parts. That would include a fall-back extrication by the federal government.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator MacEachen. Unfortunately, our time has run out. Professor Cairns, thank you very much for coming here to share your views with us. They have been very helpful to us.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Alex B. Macdonald, Q.C., was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Our next witness this afternoon is Mr. Alex B. Macdonald, Q.C. Mr. Macdonald has given us a copy of his notes, and these have been distributed to all honourable senators. As well, we have put on senators' desks a résumé of Mr. Macdonald. I will not go into details, except to say that he has the distinction of having sat here in Ottawa as a member of Parliament. He also sat as an MLA in his province of British Columbia, where he was a cabinet minister.

Mr. Macdonald, our normal practice is to proceed for 15 or 20 minutes and then proceed to a question period. Unfortunately, we must cease our hearings at six o'clock, because, under our rules, the Senate must rise at six o'clock. If time runs out, I may have to cut the questioners off. Therefore, if you are ready to proceed, Mr. Macdonald, please do so.

Mr. Alex B. Macdonald, Q.C., Professor, Simon Fraser University: Mr. Chairman, I am ready to proceed. I am very pleased to be here. I could say many things about the Canadian Senate, because my uncle, Mr. J.H. King, was government leader in the Senate. There was one point when he took umbrage, when I kept referring to the chamber as the "red chamber." However, he was a distinguished leader in the Senate when I was very young.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak from my notes rather than to read them. I am trying to envisage what the Meech Lake accords will do to the Canada of my grandchildren and yours, and to look at the situation in a very practical way. Although in these accords we are not merely passing another statute, at times it almost sounds as if we are: We have left out the North. We will fix it up next year. We have left out Senate reform. We will fix that up at another conference. It is being treated almost as if it were another statute.

Mr. Chairman, we are carving out the constitutional future of Canada for at least the next 100 years, and we are making a very basic change which a good Canadian premier, namely, Robert Bourassa, described in these words, immediately after the signing of Meech Lake. He said: "Canada is to be a much more decentralized country than it was last Wednesday."

I do not know of many constitutions—and here I am thinking of Australia, Germany or the United States—which grant to one of their federated states powers which are so clear, so important, and so watertight in their interpretation. That was what was said about this agreement in the Toronto

Star on May 4, 1987. In fact, this accord represents a major shift in the direction of a country that Wilfrid Laurier said should inherit the 20th century.

Honourable senators, I have listened to the discussion this afternoon and I have put down the basic reasons why I think that the First Ministers should be asked to return to the table. I know that is difficult, in view of the expectations that have been raised, particularly in the province of Quebec, but I think that that is something that will not come as too much of a shock for this country, which has the prospect of becoming a great country of the world. I think it is quite possible to say to the people of Quebec—as it is to the people of any other part of Canada—that we cannot have such a constitution in a modern, closely-interknit, global village where even national states have the greatest difficulty protecting the welfare of their citizens from the buffeting of monetary crises, trade cartels, and the like. It is clear that you cannot confer the necessary social and economic benefits and fairness on the people of a country to make it a great nation when you have balkanized that nation. After all, the provinces cannot do those things. They do not have coinage; they do not have a central bank; they do not have a common market, although they are part of a common market. Only the national government can do those things.

Therefore, honourable senators, in my brief I have set out my three basic concerns. I submit that these accords will fundamentally weaken the ability of the national government to meet the social and economic challenges of the modern world.

Somewhere in these pages I mention that John A. Macdonald and Étienne Cartier had a different kind of challenge to meet, because the world was different. They had the military threat from south of the border; they had the problem of how to prevent the western lands from being usurped; they had to try to develop some kind of public credit and put a railway across this country, if it was to be a country. Today our challenge is different. Our challenge is to give Canada a national identity, and be more than just an appendage or a follower or a satellite of one of the superpowers—in this case the superpower to the south. You cannot do that if the federal government—the national government—does not have the economic tools to set basic directions in social and economic matters.

People say to me, “What do you know about Quebec, la belle province?”

[Translation]

“You are a poor Scottish Canadian, perhaps an Indian from Vancouver.”

[English]

As a British Columbian, looking at Quebec and loving the fact that its uniqueness is part of the richness of this country, I have some perspective in this matter. I think that by the weakening of the federal government, as I have been describing it and as Premier Bourassa described it, you will not have that strong government, along with strong provinces, which enabled Canada through the years to protect and to assist in the development of the Quebec culture.

If we follow the routes of the weakening of federal authority and—if I may say so, but I am out of order in saying so—if we lose the dictates over our own policy through free trade agreements, I see French-Canadian culture imperilled. Nobody seems to argue about that or say to the people of Quebec that there should be cultural, linguistic and educational autonomy. However, when you take economic and social powers away from your central government—it is yours as much as anybody else’s—then, as Henri Bourassa said, you are getting close to la mer immense d’américanismes “saxonisant”, if I can remember his words correctly. That was his fear.

The French-Canadian people recognized not only in 1865 but during the War of 1812 and the American Revolution of 1775 that they needed a Canada strong enough to give them provincial culture and autonomy. They did not go into the melting pot, but they are getting too close to it for comfort. The rest of Canadians are also getting too close for comfort to that melting pot, in my opinion, at the present time.

Not too long ago I was talking to Jean Chrétien. He said that Quebecers want a strong Quebec and a strong Canada. In his riding of Chicoutimi they elected a P.Q. and a strong federalist Liberal. In their minds there was nothing inconsistent about that, although logically there would be.

As you all know, there are a lot of people who are terribly unhappy about the process. However, let me go on to some of the practical things while my 15 minutes still abides. Let us talk about judges. I do not think that Robert Bourassa asked for this, but the provincial listings of appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada will mean, in practical terms, that the federal government will not be able to resist appointing a listed name from the province of Quebec for a vacancy—of course, someone with proper qualifications, somebody without two heads, and a good lawyer, and so forth. In time, the same will be true of Ontario. To resist will mean a Robert Bork case almost: “What are your reasons? Why are you doing that? We have the right to list names. This is an affront. Prove it before a committee that our nominee is unsuitable.” There has been a provincial move in Canada for a long time—and when I was attorney general I did not participate in it—for provincial control of the appointment of superior court judges under section 96 of the Constitution. I can tell stories about how that has been used in terms of forcing the federal government to take such and such a nominee, but I do not have the time.

You are starting a trend here of the provinces naming the judges, those judges being representative of provinces and regions. I do not know how the West will work out the task of appointing its two judges. The provinces will either get together and create one list or they will compete with one another, but nobody has even discussed that point in any detail, as far as I know.

You are seeing a tilt in the judicial interpretation of the Canadian Constitution in favour of further provincialization in the Meech Lake Accord at the present time. In a period of national crisis, the "6-and-5 per cent"—known as the anti-inflation case—was subjected to a court decision. I believe that there were three judges sitting with Chief Justice Bora Laskin. Justice Laskin said that this was a case with national dimensions; this was a matter that concerned all Canadians, and only all Canadians could cope with the problem. The 6-and-5 was upheld, but just upheld as an emergency, even though in this modern world most people recognize that the problems of inflation and unemployment and spending and deficits are all so closely intertwined and that they have to be tackled if we are to become a nation. So I regret this regression from the national authority in terms of the court.

You would expect spending programs to be close to my heart, and I suppose they are. I signed one of them a long time ago. The first matching-funds program was legal aid. At that time in British Columbia we were getting fifty cent dollars, but certain things were being done by that kind of program. You had the feeling you were not only getting some help to establish standards in British Columbia but this was going to spread a mari usque ad mare. You also had the feeling that it would be helping in terms of regional disparities, which are a bigger threat to Canadian unity than some of the other things that we talk about. With the national government drawing revenues from the richer provinces, the fifty cents they put up helps the poorer regions in social programs. Some people have called a halt to that process, because they thought we were interfering with section 92 of the Constitution—rights of the provinces. There were complaints, but I do not think it was the people complaining about 100 or so social programs; it was powercrats and provincial politicians. So the process was slowed down. No more were these programs imposed by constitutional usage. There was a great deal of consultation, and there would be.

In practice, the national spending power was being limited. But to rigidify that and put that in the Constitution so that whatever the social program, whatever the need is, you cannot set national standards? Can you not provide that incentive to spread some kind of a necessary social program from coast to coast, whether it is day care or educational enhancement? It could be medical in the future, because they say that the Meech Lake Accord applies to new programs. Change Medicare enough and it will be a new program. What's a matching fund program? Almost everything. It includes the Senate report Only Work Works.

● (1720)

But you cannot have a program like that, which, to me, sounds useful because it takes the money that is now going into welfare programs and puts young people to work so that they have a sense of pride. You have to have matching funds to do that. That will be the case under this arrangement, and there will have to be bargaining sessions, and the federal government will have to give more to the provinces in order to get the consent of all of the provinces, or the federal government will have to give some province a contract to build frigates. Perhaps British Columbia will be given a contract to build frigates if it agrees to some further advance in the constitutional debate, I just do not know.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

I think we are balkanizing this country. I think my 15 minutes are just about up. I hope that people will then—

The Chairman: You are doing quite well.

Mr. Macdonald: I have many points that should be considered, but let me finish off properly by saying that I speak as a British Columbian and as a Canadian. By all means, let us support the legislative authority of the provinces to deal with provincial problems; equally, let us support the ability of the common centre to meet the great challenges of our times—unemployment, inflation, provincial and regional disparities. I think the ministers should go back to the table. I think that would be good for Canada and even good for them.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Macdonald.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The first questioner will be Senator Perrault, followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I have known Alex Macdonald for many years. We served in the British Columbia legislature together, and he has not lost one ounce of his fire or eloquence. He has made an excellent presentation this afternoon.

With respect to the manner in which this agreement has been brought into being, many have said it has been almost ushered into this world in furtive haste. In Australia all constitutional changes are put to a public referendum. They must achieve 50 per cent of the support of the general population as well as the support of all of the states. Would you suggest that a public referendum would be the desirable form of deciding on this issue in the ultimate?

Mr. Macdonald: I just wonder whether so complicated a matter, with so many clauses and subclauses and amending formulas, can go to a referendum. But I think if the ministers agreed to return to the negotiating table, and the legislatures and the Parliament held committee meetings to deal with the outstanding issues, that that would be much better. Some of those outstanding issues have been cleaned up, but the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces could listen to people. What's the rush? What if it takes two or three years for that process?

This process is like Alice in Wonderland, sentence first, verdict after. We are committed. We have an expensive car that we agreed to buy and now we are sitting around in committees and appraising the value. It is too late.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Government in the Senate has suggested that this agreement is some sort of gossamer web, and that if we pull one strand the whole thing will come apart and that will be a disaster for the country.

But he did say, as you may well know, Mr. Macdonald, that if the agreement contained some sort of egregious error the government would go back to the drafting board.

Would you categorize your concerns as being egregious errors?

Mr. Macdonald: Some of this is amusing. They say that Canadians are dull, but if one reads the joint committee report on this one will see that there is a great deal of humour in it, although it is unconscious humour.

For a modern country to have an amending formula with respect to the Senate—I raise that because this is where I am—that gives our good friend Joe Ghiz a veto and, at the same time, allows him to name, over time, his four senators—and everybody has a veto. It is Alice in Wonderland, the Canadian soft option disease: “Everybody shall win, everybody shall have prizes. If Quebec wants a veto, give everybody a veto and we will solve the problem.”

Senator Perrault: We have been reminded on a number of occasions that that negotiation represents a masterful piece of work, although several of the premiers have said that they received things they did not even ask for. I wonder, Mr. Macdonald, if you could tell us how you qualify the style of negotiation which this agreement represents. Do you think this agreement is the result of tough bargaining or concession on the part of the federal government?

Mr. Macdonald: No, I do not, and I think the point is so important that I will quote from the Meech Lake negotiations. It is important because creative federalism has got to be in a state of tension. There is bargaining back and forth. There is a bit of a quarrel always going on for power, perks and patronage. Those are the creative tensions that make a federal country important.

Premier Pawley was a very bad boy. Out of school he talked about the secret meetings with Francis Russell of the Winnipeg Free Press. He said: “Mulroney never once defended the national government’s powers, but I felt that he was not unhappy that Peterson and I were doing that.”

That sounds very political for me, and I am not trying to make this into a partisan debate, but I do not think every item in the Meech Lake Accord represents power flowing out from the centre to the peripheries.

I defy anyone to name one item where there was an egression of national authority to deal with the modern world, not one that I can see.

Senator Perrault: I had some questions on the North, but I will pass. I thank Mr. Macdonald for his responses.

The Chairman: Thank you. I now call upon Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Macdonald, I appreciate the comments you have made on the spending power, but I should like to ask you another question at this point. The previous witness, Professor Cairns, in another forum, said that the proper question to ask of the premiers was: What did they ask for and what did they get? We know what Premier Bourassa asked for and we know what he got.

Do you have any idea what Premier Vander Zalm asked for and what he got?

Mr. Macdonald: I think he said publicly—my premier—that he was against French on Corn Flakes boxes, and so forth. But he is a good hearted Canadian. I do not think that is a real prejudice. He said that he was against Bourassa’s demands at the beginning, but when he went away he had such a fine feast offered him at Sussex Drive that he agreed. He now has the power to appoint prospective senators. He has the power to appoint judges. He will go for the rest of the judges under section 96. He will say, “If I can do it for one, why are you interfering with the other superior court judges?” He also has a veto of his own, which he may give up for something. That is the danger once you begin a one-way irreversible decentralization process—it can snowball.

Senator Marsden: You have also suggested this afternoon, twice, that the premiers should go back to the table and try to get something better. If that should happen—and most of our witnesses have suggested that that would be a very good thing—would not what you have just referred to occur with Premier Vander Zalm coming in with something he wanted? Why would that lead to an improvement?

Mr. Macdonald: The people did not speak on these proposals prior to the two Meech Lake meetings. My suggestion is that we hear from the people of Canada in the process of the First Ministers returning to the table.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Macdonald.

The Chairman: Next on the list is Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), followed by Senator Marchand.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Macdonald made reference to the method by which the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are to be appointed under the Meech Lake provisions. I am seeking clarification. I believe Mr. Macdonald said that the government of a province might insist that “a listed name” be accepted by the Governor in Council. Did I hear that correctly? Does that imply that a province could submit a list consisting of only one name?

● (1730)

Mr. Macdonald: Yes. I do not see why it cannot be a list of one name, or a list of two names with one that is so obviously ineligible that, in effect, it is a list of one name.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have heard that view before. I am asking you the question because you have had extensive legal experience. Do you know of any precedent that might help us with regard to the meaning of the word “list” in a context such as this?

Mr. Macdonald: No, I don’t. You say that you have the right to “list.” It could be interpreted that that means that you must have at least two names. However, I do not think it does. I know of no precedent.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But you are saying that, in your view, it might well be just one name, or, if that proved not to be acceptable one way or another, the list could be compiled so that the other people on the so-called list were disqualified by reason of, for example, professional incompetence.

Mr. Macdonald: If Premier Vander Zalm, for example—to take a name, which I should not—wanted to have his “Bork” appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, he would list the name if there was a B.C. vacancy. If the government said, “That is only one name,” he could add a couple of other names on there that would be totally unacceptable so that, in effect, he is pushing one name. The result is that the federal government rejects the others. It then starts the whole process. He could say, “You have accepted them from other provinces, what is wrong with this person? Prove that he is unacceptable.” It is difficult to do.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You spoke now of a B.C. vacancy. Are you suggesting that under the Meech Lake system not only will there be a certain number of places for Quebec but that each of the other provinces will develop, by convention perhaps, a claim to so many places or a place whenever the opportunity occurs?

Mr. Macdonald: The court is composed of nine persons. Out of that number, constitutionally three are for Quebec; Ontario traditionally has three members; there are two for the West spread over four provinces; and the North has nothing. It is difficult to understand how these two from the West will be chosen. Will they draw straws as to which province can submit a list or will they get together? I do not know. But it will be quite a game that will go on.

We were making some progress as a nation into improving the already high quality of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. They were not patronage appointments, they were going through the CBA, and other things were in the works. We have now stepped back and given it to the provinces in the way that I have suggested, with none of the safeguards as to quality and non-partisanship that were slowly emerging.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Stewart. I have four more names on my list, so I will have to cut the list off. We have a little less than 20 minutes, so I will have to ask each one of them to keep their questions down so that I do not have to use the gavel.

Next is Senator Marchand, followed by Senator Olson.

Senator Marchand: Thank you, Mr. Macdonald, for appearing in the Senate, and thank you for your excellent presentation. Welcome to the Senate from one British Columbian to another.

There are many questions to raise. I agree with the thrust of your statement so much that I find it difficult sometimes to frame some of the questions that I wanted to ask.

You have been involved in provincial government in the legislature for a number of years. The people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories were extremely unhappy about many things in the Meech Lake Accord, but one in particular was the formation of new provinces. As you know, under the Meech Lake Accord unanimity is now required before new provinces can be formed. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories are thinking at some point in the future of becoming provinces.

Would you comment upon that? They would like—and I support this—to become a new province by direct negotiation with the federal government. Personally, I agree with that.

Mr. Macdonald: I do not know why we have tightened up that process of new province formation in this kind of unbelievable way. Originally, when we were a British colony, it was the British Crown that could carve out a new province. Then it was the federal government with the Alberta Act and the Manitoba Act. Under the 1982 Charter it was under the amending formula, which was two-thirds of the provinces plus 50 per cent of the population and that the new province not touch the boundary of any other provinces. Now the criterion is unanimity. We are closing the ability to make that provincial decision to an incredible extent, and I do not know why we are taking it away from the national government, even though it is not within provincial boundaries.

Senator Marchand: Do you agree with it?

Mr. Macdonald: No, I think it is an injustice to the people. I do not think they may be ready to become a province, but we are telling them that they are second-class citizens, that they are kind of out there in the North—mainly a native population, I may say; first Canadians—and that they are not really part of the mainstream, but if they are good people and get unanimity they might be some day.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marchand. Next is Senator Olson.

Senator Marchand: I am not finished. May I ask one more question?

The Chairman: It will have to be fast, Senator Marchand. I have three other questioners.

Senator Marchand: I have one question on process.

Why aren't the people of Canada raising hell about Meech Lake? You heard Professor Cairns, and you heard this question from Senator MacEachen earlier. Why are they not raising hell? They should be raising hell about the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Macdonald: Because they have been let down by the party discipline system. Most of them have given up, because the three parties, through their leaders, all said, “Me, too,”—I presume for electoral reasons. In British Columbia people are saying that the premier will not hold hearings, it will be party discipline. And even if you do get the opposition to change its mind it will be majority endorsement. People become apathetic, and they are poorer Canadians for that.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marchand. Next is Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: Mr. Macdonald, I would like to refer you to your notes where you talk about the national shared-cost programs. Based on your experience as a member of a provincial cabinet, what do you think will happen to some of the programs that we have now? There is some renewing of the arrangements, for example, with Medicare and other cost-shared programs. You say, for example, that a provincial right to take the money and run is subject only to limitations as objectives or initiatives. As these programs come up for renewal, if these amendments are made to the Constitution where there is a financial compensation alternative, do you think they will renew these programs?

Mr. Macdonald: I am speaking now as a politician. If I were a national politician and knew that I could pony up money in a great social program that I would be proud of, but knew that a province could, on its own initiative, take the national money—because there are no set standards—and implement a program on its own, I would be inclined to say, “Let’s spend the national money in some other way.” I think there is a political disincentive, and I see, for example, Monique Bégin’s gallant fight to stop extra-billing never happening again if this goes through. We are balkanizing. We will have better medical services in British Columbia than we will have in Newfoundland.

● (1740)

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald: Yes, we will, because we are a richer province and we are moving away from national standards under the terms of this Meech Lake Accord.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, we may have a little more time, because Senator Olson asked exactly the question I had in mind.

However, I would comment on the fact that Mr. Macdonald, representing a province which is a “have” province, seems to be worrying about the distribution of wealth. On the other hand, at least three Atlantic premiers have gone along with this deal. I would like to know if Mr. Macdonald has any insight regarding how they intend to face their electorate if, for example, at one point it means poorer medical services in one of the “have not” provinces versus one of the “have” provinces.

Mr. Macdonald: If I were still running in British Columbia, would it be a political problem? I do not think so. I think that generally people in Canada wanted to correct regional disparities. I think the equalization programs were generally popular. I do not know what Senator van Roggen would say, but I did not find provincial backbiting about making us a country with reasonable standards from coast to coast.

I cannot speak for the Atlantic provinces. It is hard to make this a political issue. It is of grave concern to the country, and it should be a political issue, especially in places like Atlantic Canada, but, from my distance, it does not seem to be.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): In case I was misunderstood, I should like to say that I was thanking Mr. Macdonald for raising this issue, because I too am astonished as to how silent my part of the country has been. We would have been desperate had it not been for equalization—which we enshrined in the Constitution in 1982—and for cost-sharing programs. I also point out that over 90 per cent of university expenditures are covered by federal grants.

Thank you very much, Mr. Macdonald.

Mr. Macdonald: All of the political leaders said, “This is great.” They should not have said that, and particularly the social democratic side should not have said that, because it shut off so much debate. People said, “If three of them think it is all right, then it must be O.K.”

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First, I wish to sincerely thank Mr. Macdonald for his excellent presentation.

[English]

Being one of those westerners who is part of a large population of French-Canadians in western Canada, St. Boniface, I appreciate your comments on No. 3, which you submitted to us, and I would like to quote it. You state the following:

A weakened Canada will no longer be able to cherish and preserve its unique cultures; in particular French-Canadian language and culture will slowly but surely drown in the vast North American market place.

Although I know time is short, I would appreciate it if you would expand on that.

Mr. Macdonald: I do not know what more I can say. The Americans are our closest allies in everything, but that market creates its own cultures, and you need these central powers to make a nation of Canada that is distinctive. You should not weaken that too much. Without that centre British Columbia will just be north of California and Manitoba may be part of the midlands of the United States.

I think the federal government has done a pretty good job of protecting the French language in Canada. I, for one, applaud it, although my French is mauvais. I think we are weakening it in respect to the anglophone minority in Quebec and the francophone minorities in the rest of Canada. This is a very bad thing from their point of view.

The Chairman: Senator Marchand, I cut you off in your questioning. If you wish to ask your question, there is some time left.

Senator Marchand: I have lost the context. My question would be a little disjointed now. I am satisfied with the answers given to me by Mr. Macdonald.

The Chairman: I apologize for cutting you off earlier, but it was a problem of time.

This concludes the questioning. Mr. Macdonald, I want to thank you for coming from British Columbia to share your views with us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on March 2.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I propose that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit during the next sitting of the Senate, because there is a report I would like to make tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 11, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE A. IRVINE BARROW THE HONOURABLE JEAN LE MOYNE

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, if, as expected, the Senate adjourns today until March 1, between now and then we shall lose two valued colleagues, two excellent senators, who will reach the age of 75 and compulsory retirement. Senator Irvine Barrow retires on Monday next, February 15, and Senator Jean Le Moynes retires on Wednesday next, February 17.

Senator Barrow has been in the Senate for the past 13 years. The Leader of the Opposition the other day referred to the excellent timing that was present in 1963 when Senators Phillips, Walker and Bélisle were appointed to the Senate in the dying hours of the Diefenbaker government. In the case of Senator Barrow, the press release announcing his appointment arrived in the Parliamentary Press Gallery as the vote was being taken in the House of Commons on the day that the Trudeau government lost a confidence vote on the budget in 1974. So the instrument of appointment for Senator Barrow was, I suspect, the last document His Excellency signed before the Writ of Dissolution of that Parliament arrived at Government House.

Senator Frith: Going out in a blaze of glory!

Senator Murray: That Parliament went out in a blaze of glory, as Senator Frith suggests.

Before Senator Barrow was summoned to the Senate he was an eminent member of the chartered accountancy profession of Nova Scotia, a most generous and active contributor to many good causes in the community, a governor of Dalhousie University, and was active in the Maritime Provinces Board of Trade and the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. He is a former director of the Bank of Canada and of the Industrial Development Bank, and served as chairman of the Halifax-Dartmouth Metropolitan Committee on Problems of Regional Development.

As I think all honourable senators know, throughout his time in the Senate he has been a valued member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and for a time was its chairman. He was also a member of the Internal Economy Committee and played an extremely important role as chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets.

I simply want to record publicly my appreciation, that of the government and that of my colleagues for the splendid record of service of Senator Irvine Barrow to the Senate and, through the Senate, to Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Our friend, the Honourable Jean Le Moynes, is one of the greatest writers in French Canada. Already his first essays published in the 30s heralded Convergences, the masterpiece for which he received the Governor General's Award and the Athanas David Award in 1962, and the Molson Award in 1968.

Apparently ill at ease as a result of so much publicity, Jean Le Moynes decided to become Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau's ghost writer, a position he held between 1969 and 1978.

This undoubtedly deprived us of a few masterpieces bearing the signature of Jean Le Moynes, but perhaps this is how we ever came to know a few others signed by Pierre Elliott Trudeau. As well, this is how he contributed to the proceedings of this august assembly.

Appointed to the Senate in December 1982, Senator Le Moynes was immediately carried away by the zeal of this institution. You are all aware of his outstanding contribution to our committees.

His eloquent speeches are probably the aspect of his work in this chamber that we will remember most readily.

Through his broad culture, his intense spirituality, and his enlightened interventions Senator Jean Le Moynes did contribute to raise the level of debates in this house. Even though I did not always share his views I could never remain indifferent to the nobility of his remarks.

So, to both Senator Barrow and Senator Le Moynes I say: Farewell, our best wishes go with you.

[English]

Much luck, good health and happiness in your retirement years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, most of you, if not all of you, will remember that last evening the Speaker offered his hospitality and that of his elegant chambers to Senators Barrow and Le Moynes, to the rest of us and to some guests to mark—I say “mark” rather than “celebrate”—the departure of these two valued colleagues. It is difficult to avoid repetition in paying the tribute that these two senators justly deserve. I say that because, after the appropriate comments made by the Leader of the Government and the particularly appropriate comments made by the Speaker last evening, little is left to be said.

Therefore, I will make a suggestion that I hope will not necessarily become a precedent. Because I thought the words of the Speaker last evening were so appropriate, we should ensure that our fellow citizens have an opportunity to share them. Those words should appear in the records of the Senate so that what was an excellent expression of our feelings last night can be shared with the Canadians they served so well.

With your permission and support, I suggest that those comments appear as an appendix to Debates of the Senate for this day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

(For text of His Honour's address, see appendix, p. 2775.)

Senator Frith: I want only to add a comment about each of these valued colleagues and, I hope and believe, dear friends.

Concerning Senator Barrow, it has been justly said that he was a model senator. Although this is a personal comment, I make it as a former Deputy Leader of the Government and now as Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and to put it in the most simple terms, I can say about Senator Barrow that he always did whatever he was asked to do in performing his senatorial duties and he always did it well.

● (1410)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Frith: As for Senator Le Moynes, I want to comment briefly on two aspects of his Senate work which struck me: his interest in languages, particularly Canada's two official languages, and the importance of a faithful translation of speeches and conferences here in the Senate. He wanted the translation to be both faithful and eloquent.

By the way, I believe he does not accept this cynical and perhaps chauvinist expression, but when I was a member of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission I would be told that a translation is like a woman: if it is beautiful, it is not faithful; if it is faithful, it is not beautiful.

His other interest was poetry. One of Senator Le Moynes' many contributions other than his work here was his role as a poet. This combination struck me. Reflecting upon this mixture reminded me of a quotation, unfortunately not my own words but still: "Poetry is the mother tongue of mankind".

And in French I would say: "La poésie est la langue maternelle du genre humain".

[English]

That somehow struck me as a particularly appropriate way to describe not only Senator Le Moynes' interventions here but the way, the style in which we saw him live his life and the style in which we know he is going to continue to live his life and enrich all those who have the good fortune to know him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I should like to add a brief word even though almost everything relevant has already been said with respect to the two senators who retire within the next few days.

Senator Barrow and I were associates in various political endeavours and at Dalhousie University, where he was, as has been stated, a member of the Board of Governors for many years and chairman of the largest and most successful fund-raising campaign that that university had ever had up to that time. I have come to know and respect Senator Barrow very greatly over the years of our association.

Reference was made by Senator Frith to the fact that whatever he was asked to do in the Senate, he did. That applied throughout the whole of his career. I never worked with anyone like him—if phoned and asked if he would undertake a certain job, and if he said yes, you did not have to give it another thought. It was done exactly the way he said it would be done and it was done precisely when he said it would be done. I should add to all of that—and I think this is particularly relevant—that I have not known in my lifetime any person whose personal business and political integrity I would place ahead of that of Senator Barrow.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hicks: Senator Barrow has served us well in the Senate for almost 14 years. His departure will be a loss to the Senate and to the work of the Senate, and his departure will be a matter of personal concern and regret, as far as I am concerned.

I do not have the good fortune to have known Senator Le Moynes over the period that I have known Senator Barrow, but I know of his distinctions. He has been preferred in the Order of Canada, and senators have heard a recital of his other awards and accomplishments. I remember, Senator Le Moynes, the first conversation I had with you after you came to the Senate and the good impression that left with me. That impression has been enhanced in all of the contacts I have had with you since. It is amazing that you—and this goes for Senator Barrow, too—have attained what, when I was a younger man, I used to think was the ripe old age of 75, but since I am within about two years of that myself I think it is not such a ripe old age at all. I join with others who have expressed the wish that both of you, as I am sure you will, find interesting and useful things to do in the years that lie ahead.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I had, about three-quarters of an hour ago, a call from our colleague, Senator David Walker, who sends his best regards to all of you. The poor man went down to Florida to get rid of a cold and hasn't seen the sun for something like five weeks. He would rather have been here today. He said, "Finlay, is this the last day of Barrow?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Are you going to say anything?" I said, "Yes, I was thinking of it." He said, "Would you associate me with your remarks? I am very fond of Barrow." I said, "How do you know what I am going to say?" He said, "I trust you."

Senator Frith: I believe he hasn't seen the sunshine for five weeks—or maybe he has seen a bit too much it!

Senator MacDonald: I must say, honourable senators, that his trust will not be misplaced.

With the exception of Senator Hicks, and possibly Senator MacEachen, I think I have known Augustus Irving Barrow longer than any other person in this chamber. We met in Halifax at the end of the war, over 40 years ago. Senator Murray has made reference to the contribution that Senator Barrow made to the post-war building of Halifax in all of its facets—academic, business, cultural and social.

I developed at that time a great deal of sorrow for people who were not involved in partisan activities. This particularly manifested itself in the old Halifax Club, where the bankers and those people who felt that involvement in political affairs might affect their business would stay off to one side while we, the partisans—the Liberals, Tories, et cetera—were invariably involved every day in the most vicious forms of warfare, obscenity and, usually, wagers. And pity help the person who lost the wager, because it meant that his home would be bombarded that night by those of us who sought to collect.

I developed, of course, a very close friendship with Senator Barrow all during those days. We had an enormous number of mutual friends. Familiar names abound. Alas, many of them are not here today. I found Senator Barrow to be a man of class, a man who kept his word, a man who would not speak often, and when he did he usually spoke very quietly; so much so that I nicknamed him “Mr. Excitement” in those days.

• (1420)

I only wish that I had known Senator Le Moyne one-half or one-quarter of that particular time so that I could also lend my voice in paying a tribute to him. But I have known of him and I have certainly followed everything he has done here.

My point in getting up today is to wish to Senator Barrow, to Joyce Barnstead, and to his family many more productive years in whatever career he should, and I know he will, follow.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have known Senator Le Moyne for a good many years; but I must confess that, like many of you, for a time he was just a name. We knew him by reputation. He was practically invisible. But he was the architect of many of the thoughtful and eloquent phrases reflected in some of the most important speeches made in our country. His way with words was legendary in that awesome place called the PMO. It has been so much better to have you with us, Senator Le Moyne, to have the real person in person, with your great good humour, your powerful, your sensitive, your passionate beliefs in the most important issues of the day—and for your very considerable contribution to this institution.

Senator Barrow has been much more than a seat-mate to me. He has been my long-time friend and, on many occasions, my mentor, and his contribution to the various committees of this chamber has already been well documented.

I am especially grateful to him for his wise counsel, his advice and his excellent service during the period that I happened to be the chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee between 1980 and 1984.

I have heard it said that the highest tribute that can be paid to an individual is to say that his or her word, whether given in public or in private, can be relied on absolutely. Senator Barrow, our friend, is just such a person, and I join with others in this chamber in extending to Senator Barrow and Senator Le Moyne, and, indeed, to Joyce Barrow and Suzanne Le Moyne, our best wishes for continued happiness and good health in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I regret that the exigencies of the calendar make it necessary for us to pay tribute to two of our departing colleagues in one day. If I may say so, each of them deserves at least a separate day and a special day.

I have known Senator Barrow only since I came to the Senate, and I have a high regard for his assiduous attention to duty in this place and for all that he has stood for in Nova Scotia and the country as a whole. I very much appreciate his service here, and I heartily wish for him the best of success, satisfaction and happiness in the years of non-Senate duty ahead.

I met Senator Le Moyne only since I came here. I came to admire him early after meeting him. I appreciate his magnificent felicity in language. He is magnificent in the language of Shakespeare, Macaulay and Browning. I cannot mention my favourite author, Burns, because they say he is not terribly good in English most of the time. But if Senator Le Moyne is as great in the language of these people whom I mentioned, I am sure that he is far better in the language of Racine, Montesquieu, Montaigne and Rousseau.

He has been an inspiration to us all in his clarity of expression, his acuity of perception, his integrity as he views the great questions facing our country. But even beyond all those traits I have admired him for his candour and his humour. Once, in a committee, we were a little disturbed by the draft report. Senator Le Moyne said, “The French is terrible. And the revised version will be equally bad.” I think a man with that candour endears himself to us all.

I have heard in the last few years a great deal of exaltation and exultation about what is now, in the words of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, “one of the great nostrums of public satisfaction,” the idea of an elected Senate. Of all the speeches in this chamber that I heard on the subject, the one that sticks in my mind is that of our distinguished colleague Senator Le Moyne, who, in fact, argued with his brilliant, classical elucidation that, in fact, a non-elected Upper Chamber was, in fact, a positive good. As I have sent copies of his speech out to many academics in the country, who have asked me my views on the elected Senate, without exception I would get the answer, “By God!” or “By Jove!”, depending on the individual's Presbyterianism or otherwise, “We never thought of it in that way." So here is a man who has caused at least some of us to think of a popular solution in a different way, and what is intellectualism for if it is not to stimulate thought along some line other than the "Appian Way" of public acceptance?

So, honourable senators, I think that we have been enormously enriched by the presence of this man with his great mind, his enormous sensitivity to the present needs of his country, and with his genial personality which has caused all of us to love him dearly and to wish that perhaps in 1965 the termination of Senate incumbency at 75 years of age had never taken place.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, it is almost nine years since I became a member of this great house, and I have never risen to make comments on the departure of any of my colleagues to this point. However, today I feel I have to, because in the retirement of Senator Barrow and Senator Le Moyne I am losing two great advisers. I want to add something to what Senator Macquarrie just said with regard to the law requiring senators to retire at 75. When that law was passed I was part of another house and I did not know much about the Senate. I remember thinking to myself at the time, "At least they have done one good thing up there in Ottawa." However, one should realize that no law is perfect, and today we are suffering the effects of a law that was passed with good intentions, but which prevents two distinguished members of this house from continuing as senators.

● (1430)

With respect to Senator Barrow, I want to say briefly that when I first came here to the Senate he noticed—as perhaps did some other senators—that I was not quite suited for this chamber. I had just come from another legislative house where things were more active. In that other place I was sitting on the front bench; I was house leader, and my colleagues here in the Senate who were members of that other place at that time will remember that I loved that place. I said when I left that I loved the legislature, and when I arrived here I can honestly tell you that, although I was very much impressed, I did not feel at all at home, and sometimes I used to confide in Senator Barrow. That is why I say I am losing friends as well as neighbours, because I had the great fortune of having an office in the East Block side-by-side with Senator Barrow. His secretary and mine shared an office, and what a neighbour and a counsellor Senator Barrow was! I remember at times I would tell him how dejected I was about the Senate, and he would put his hand on my shoulder and say, "Norbert, quiet down; you will learn." I want to say to him today that I have learned, Senator Barrow, and thank you very much.

[Translation]

I will also miss Senator Le Moyne because, as you all know, when I compare my French with Senator Le Moyne's spoken and written French, I am somewhat ill at ease. But for some years I have had the advantage of sitting near him and every time I needed a definition, a synonym, an interpretation, a pronunciation, a spelling, either in French or in English, I only had to turn to Senator Le Moyne and there was the answer. I will miss that, although I am lucky in that hopefully our friend Senator Corbin will remain near me, and as long as he is at his desk behind me, as well as Senator Hébert, I will have valuable consultants.

Senator Le Moyne has struck me since I have known him as a poet—there was reference to that—an author and a writer. I read some of his writings. He struck me as a French Canadian, a Quebecer who in my view always put his allegiance to his country before his province. In Quebec, many people are more loyal to their province. It is not for me to judge whether they have more or less, but they often claim they have a country. Senator Le Moyne is a French Canadian from Quebec but he is a true Canadian and all Canadian citizens and all senators will miss him.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I bring greetings and praise to our two retiring colleagues today from other colleagues who are travelling in another part of the country, namely, Senator Hébert, Senator Neiman and Senator Doyle. As you know, the four of us were travelling in the West with the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and were bemoaning the fact that we would miss the conviviality and friendship at the party held by Your Honour last evening.

Senator Graham raised the question of Senator Le Moyne's existence and career prior to being a member of this place, and, as one who worked with great enthusiasm and affection with Senator Le Moyne for a number of years in the office of former Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, I developed enormous respect and affection for this man. In my mind, Jean Le Moyne has one of the rarest of gifts: he can make words live; he can make them live in English and, more particularly, in his beloved French. He is a very warm-hearted man. He has a passion for Canada which, from the moment I met him, has moved me. Through all of the issues in the last 20 years that have touched on the unity of our country Senator Le Moyne's loyalty to his province, inside a larger loyalty to his country, is a very touching and rare attribute in a Canadian politician.

I have only come to know Senator Barrow since I joined this chamber. I know from his friends what a distinguished gentleman he is. From my own observation he is a wise man and one who has been very kind to a newcomer in this house.

To both of them and to their families I wish many more years of great activity, happiness and good health.

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau: Honourable senators, almost everything has been said that ought to be said. However, I feel the obligation to pay personal tributes to the two retiring senators—Senator Barrow and Senator Le Moyne. I have a great deal of respect for these two senators, and I regret that circumstances demand that they depart from this chamber.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, during his brief stay in the Senate, Senator Le Moyne earned esteem and even admiration from his colleagues. I am convinced that his departure is a regrettable loss for the Senate. He served it well and he served his country well.

I wish him good health and happiness in retirement.

[English]

As for Senator Barrow, he and I were appointed to the Senate on the same day, namely, May 8, 1974. From that day on I got to know him and appreciate him. Throughout the years he has been a source of encouragement and guidance to me on very many occasions, as well as a true friend. I have greatly benefited from his presence here, as I am sure a great number of us have. I view his departure with a sense of sadness. However, this is not an occasion for sadness. Senator Barrow is a practical man, and on that basis my thought is that he is going into retirement with a well-prepared program as to how best to use his time and energy with his family in the days ahead. He has served the Senate very well and has served his country well. May he continue to enjoy himself in a more leisurely way of life. To him and his wife, Joyce, I extend my best wishes for a happy retirement.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with those who have spoken before me in paying tribute to our two colleagues who are about to retire.

Honourable Senator Barrow was a constant visitor, as a young accountant, to my home province of Newfoundland. After hearing him recount his experiences there, I feel that I have known him for much longer than his tenure here in the Senate.

● (1440)

As has already been said, Senator Barrow has been a conscientious and hard-working senator. He served with distinction on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and on the Internal Economy Committee. As his party whip, I can assure all honourable senators that he was always ready to cooperate in the orderly running of the Senate and its committees. I now wish to thank Senator Barrow publicly for his cooperation over the years.

May I take this opportunity to wish Senator Barrow many pleasant years of retirement with his charming wife, Joyce, and his family. I know he will not be going out to pasture but will be involved in other endeavours. I wish him well in them.

In the short time I have known Senator Le Moynes I have come to admire his sense of dedication and ready wit. He was always ready to cooperate in the work of the Senate and its committees. I now wish to thank him publicly for his cooperation.

When he and I were travelling with the Senate Committee on Fisheries, I convinced him to accompany me to a restaurant run by a well-known chain. He accepted that invitation, much against his better judgment. I hope he can now find it in his heart to forgive me for extending that invitation.

May I take this opportunity to wish Senator Le Moynes many pleasant years of retirement. I know he will not be idle. I wish him well in whatever he undertakes.

[Translation]

I wish you good health, my friend.

[English]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will be very brief. I did not have the privilege of knowing Senator Barrow very long, but the few contacts I did have with him told me that I could trust him completely. Whenever he gave his word, he kept it.

I have had the privilege of knowing Senator Le Moynes longer. He always made me despair when I heard him speak, because I am a man of words, but, compared to him, of low quality.

I just received a telephone call from former Prime Minister Trudeau who wishes Senator Le Moynes well. He said that now that Senator Le Moynes is retiring he hopes to see him more often. He invites Senator Le Moynes to lunch on March 11, and has asked me to take him along. He said that he was, for him, the ideal man of Marcus Aurelius, a man of wisdom and good humour.

CURRENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc, chairman of Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 11, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-99, An Act to amend the Currency Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, January 28, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when will this bill be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is a good possibility that we will not be here next week. If that is so, why not give this bill third reading now?

Senator Doody: That is agreeable, honourable senators. I thank Senator Frith for his cooperation.

The probabilities are that we will be adjourning for a two-week period. This may be an appropriate time to mention that various Senate committees have meetings scheduled during that adjournment. If things proceed today as we hope they will, Bill C-60 will be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. That is the bill relating to the Copyright Act. There is also the possibility that Bill C-84 will be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, which currently is considering Bill C-55. That committee is currently meeting on the west coast regarding that piece of legislation.

There are various studies under way by other committees, namely, the Energy Committee, the Agriculture Committee, the Fisheries Committee and the National Defence Committee. Despite the fact that the Senate itself may not be sitting over the next two weeks, many members of the Senate will be actively engaged in committee work.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MEECH LAKE CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

SUBMISSIONS GROUP EMPOWERED TO PERMIT COVERAGE BY ELECTRONIC MEDIA

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord be empowered to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public proceedings with the least possible disruption of its hearing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 1, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Motion agreed to.

● (1450)

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I draw to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the visitors' gallery of the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Arnold Tusa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

STATUS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us here in the Senate, not about proceedings in the other place but why the government is putting on hold the bill to strengthen the Official Languages Act?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not aware that that statement is accurate.

Senator Frith: Can we then take it that the reports to that effect are not true, and if they suggest that the government itself is not going to proceed with that bill but is going to put it on hold—which is the report—that those reports are not well founded?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, those reports are not well founded. Bill C-72 has been introduced for debate on second reading and has had several days of debate on second reading.

Senator Frith: And it is still the government's policy to press forward with that bill?

Senator Murray: That is correct, honourable senators.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALBERTA NURSES' LABOUR DISPUTE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSULTATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF SETTLEMENT

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a matter that I think is of some national importance, and that is the continuing strike of the Union of Nurses in Alberta.

I was in Edmonton on Monday and found on my visit there that there is a good deal of public support for the nurses. The public feeling is that their cause is just. Also, there is a concern about the health and welfare of the people of Alberta and, more particularly, of the people who are ill. There is an urgency to this which is associated with the Winter Olympics, which will be under way soon.

I had the good fortune to visit the nurses on the picket line at the Edmonton General Hospital. I believe that they are concerned about the health of patients in hospitals, but took this action believing that the situation was desperate, understanding all the while that they play a major part in health services and the restoration of health for people in that province.

I heard some news reports today that I felt were quite disturbing and because of that I sent the following communication to Premier Donald Getty of Alberta. It states:

Dear Premier Getty:

News reports indicate that the Alberta Hospital Association appears determined to bring the Alberta Union of Nurses to its knees by threatening to discontinue the check off of union dues and by further refusing to agree to the rehiring of nurses dismissed for union activity.

I think the current attitude of the Alberta Hospital Association and the government of Alberta is anti-union; is opposed to free democratic trade unions and the free collective bargaining process.

I call on you Mr. Premier to use your good offices to try to bring this dispute to a settlement; a settlement that recognizes the right of the Alberta Union of Nurses to free collective bargaining and that all nurses discharged in this dispute be reinstated without penalty.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Point of order! Is this a question, a document to be tabled, an inquiry, or a debate? Could the honourable senator tell us? I thought we were in Question Period, but this does not seem to be a question to me.

Senator Argue: I am coming to the question, and I hope that you will agree, when I come to it, that it is in order. I think the question of health for people coming to the Olympics from all over the world is important. I think there is national concern, and I think we should be concerned here also.

Senator Doody: There are rules governing Question Period, honourable senators. I know that we have been most tolerant, understanding and reasonable in not calling them to the attention of the Senate and demanding that they be enforced, but surely there comes a time when one has to recognize what is a preamble, what is a debate, and what is a question in this house. I think we have gone beyond what is reasonable in this particular instance.

Senator Olson: Does that include when you were in office?

Senator Argue: If the Honourable Senator Doody would contain himself, what I was reading would take just one minute—I have almost concluded. I intend to continue. I go on to state:

Such a settlement would assist in restoring competent and efficient health services in Alberta, and I urge you to act.

I then signed this communication.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there has been any consultation or contact, to his knowledge, between any member of the federal government—particularly, I think of the Minister of Health and the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), who is responsible for the Olympics—and the provincial government with regard to this situation. Also, can he say whether or not there seems to be hope that this dispute will be settled at an early date?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we respect the Constitution.

Senator Argue: And you do not consult on matters concerning the Olympics, public health and the administration of health services in this country?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, an honourable gentleman from the province of Saskatchewan in the federal Parliament has just risen to deliver himself of a presumptuous and superfluous speech about a matter in Alberta, which is entirely within the jurisdiction of that province. That is unhelpful, and is also an abuse of his position and of the time of the Senate. I do not intend to indulge him further.

Senator Argue: I reject that entirely and completely. I think that when the Government of Canada provides 50 per cent, or close to that, of the budget for health services in this country, and when we have a stake of many millions of dollars in the Olympics, that the health of people going to the Olympics, the health of the people of Alberta, and this labour dispute should be a matter of concern for the federal government to the point that they might engage in some consultation. But the minister's reply is clear: The federal government does not seem to care about what is happening, and that's a shame.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1,2(a), 3, 7 and 13(b), (c) and (d) to Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 4, 5(a), (b), and (c), 6(a) and (b), 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 (a);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 11 and 16; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I would like to preface my remarks about Bill C-84 by indicating my appreciation of the remarks which other senators have already made on the subject in this debate.

I fully appreciate Senator Kelly's concerns about terrorists and any flaws in our legislation which make it easier for terrorists to enter Canada. He has done us all a great service in chairing a special committee to consider the presence and impact of terrorists in Canada. I certainly respect his opinion and I think all of us agree with him that we do not want Canada to become a refuge for that kind of person. But I examined each of his horrible examples—the horrible examples which Senator Kelly mentioned in his speech the other day. I think it is significant that not one of the problems raised by those examples would have been cured by Bill C-84, whether it had been passed in its original form or whether it is now passed in its present form.

● (1500)

I think Senator Nurgitz put the position of the minister very well indeed. We are all delighted with the extent to which the minister understood and accepted the points the Senate made. The committee sympathized with his intent and made every effort to give him a workable bill. The problem is that the minister went part way and then choked up, perhaps on the basis of pride of authorship on the part of either his officials or himself, and when it came to completing the job by rectifying the constitutional and international weaknesses of the bill, which would have prevented the bill from becoming effective law, he failed to follow through.

Senator Grafstein has explained very well our obligations to try to get a piece of legislation which will stand up in the courts and will be effective to carry out the objectives of the minister. I sincerely believe that that can be done with a little more work, and at the end of my remarks I will be proposing that Senator Nurgitz' motion and the message from the other place be referred to committee for further consideration.

Bill C84 is a good example of what happens when a government allows itself to be caught up in the hysteria of a particular event, which event catches the headlines and fuels the prejudices of the body politic.

This bill was presented to Parliament in the summer of 1987 in response to the arrival by boat of 174 refugee claimants in Nova Scotia. The Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Benoît Bouchard, said that the passage of the bill was needed to enable Canada "to control organized abuse of our immigration laws, deter the smuggling into Canada that jeopardizes human lives, and respond to security concerns."

The bill was passed by the House of Commons and referred to the Senate in September 1987. Honourable senators referred the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for normal consideration.

However, in the meantime, this hastily drafted band-aid legislation had attracted the attention of a great many Canadians, who found both its spirit and its language odious in light of Canada's traditional role of leadership in developing international standards of conduct for treating the homeless and oppressed people of the world in a humanitarian way.

Over 400 individuals and organizations made representations to the committee. Thirty-seven witnesses made actual appearances. Their testimony was neither sentimental nor unlettered. It dealt with the hard facts of the law as it applied to this kind of legislation.

There were few witnesses who disagreed with the announced purposes of the legislation, but one after another declared not only that the law would be ineffective but that it would be struck down by Canadian courts as being contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to our international commitments undertaken by our endorsement of the United Nations Convention relating to the status of refugees.

I have said that there was no disagreement with the objectives of the legislation as expressed by the minister. None of the members of the committee nor any witness wanted "organized abuse of our immigration laws" to be permitted. None of us wanted to encourage "the smuggling into Canada that jeopardizes human lives," and each one of us wanted our laws to "respond to security concerns." If Bill C-84 had been an effective instrument to deal with each of these concerns, then we would have had no difficulty in recommending its passage, without amendment, in our report to honourable senators.

But the term "abuse of our immigration laws" must surely be reserved for those who are not true refugees—those who attempt to obtain refugee status by fraudulent claims. Bill C-84 goes far beyond that group. Its harsh dealings apply to many people who are quite legitimately described as refugees under the international Convention. Their landing in Canada is not fraudulent and is not an abuse of our laws or of the provisions of the Convention.

Even if Bill C-84 became law, it would not "deter the smuggling into Canada that jeopardizes human lives." Human lives are jeopardized when you turn a ship around at sea, without knowledge as to who is on board, as to its destination, or whether the human cargo will ever reach a port of safety. Our witnesses and the committee both said that human lives are not jeopardized by bringing the ship into port, arresting the captain and the ship, and treating the human cargo in the very same way as they would be treated if they landed at an airport.

So the members of the committee decided that if they were going to give the minister an effective piece of legislation, which would fulfil the objectives which he himself had delineated, and the implementation of which would not be tied up in litigation in the courts for years, they would have to do some serious homework. With the help of the Canadian Bar Association, four constitutional experts, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, experts on international law and civil liberties, as well as private citizens, the committee went through the legislation with great care to correct its weaknesses and to make it a law which would effectively fulfil the minister's objectives.

I must say that that task was accepted by all of the members of the committee, and each and every member of the committee made his or her contribution. When we completed our work we were proud of our effort, and, while we would never suggest that we had done a perfect job, we believed that we had indeed accomplished all that we could do to turn a sow's ear into a silk purse.

While the minister accepted some of our amendments—and some of the amendments he accepted were of great importance to the validity of the bill—he rejected others which were equally important. I am pleased by his acceptance and saddened by his rejection.

Many have been the criticisms of the Senate for over a century, and some of those criticisms have been well deserved. But always the non-partisan perceptive work of Senate committees has been respected and frequently reflected either in current amendments to or later improvement of pieces of legislation by responsible ministers. Here we have a situation where, in spite of the best efforts of all of the members of the standing committee to make a constructive report, and in spite of the adoption of that report by the Senate as a whole, the minister has chosen to return the bill still in a highly litigious state. In its present form it will leave the Canadian public uncertain as to its interpretation and, indeed, may eventually cause it to be struck down.

Our courts have made it very clear that, as Mr. Justice Dickson said in the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunter v. Southam, "It is the legislator's responsibility to enact legislation that embodies appropriate safeguards to comply with the Constitution's requirements." The committee accepts that view of our responsibility and of the responsibility of both the House of Commons and the Senate. It is from that point of view that we must examine the minister's response to the Senate's report on Bill C-84, released by the minister on January 26, 1988. For that reason it is important that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have an opportunity to deal with that response and to make further recommendations.

Perhaps I should spend a few minutes discussing some of the matters which I feel should be reconsidered by the committee. Senate amendment No. 1 seemed rather simple. The purposes of the bill, as outlined in the proposed legislation as it came before us, included "to deter the smuggling of persons into Canada." The committee noted that the word "smuggling," properly used, referred to the movement of goods rather than of persons, and the committee recommended that that clause be replaced by what we regarded as its human equivalent, "to deter those who assist in the clandestine entry of persons into Canada." The minister has come back with the proposal to use "to deter the illegal entry of persons into Canada"—a quite different concept.

That may sound like semantic juggling to you, but there is a very important principle involved. The minister regards everyone who enters Canada without documents as an illegal migrant, regardless of whether he is entitled to be treated as a refugee under our international commitments. This stems from the government's policy of emphasizing refugee selection abroad, but it fails to take into consideration the evidence of many of the committee's witnesses and the position of the committee itself, that people who are legitimate refugees should not be treated as illegal migrants just because they have not been able to get documentation before they land. Some language must be found to resolve this dilemma or our legislation will be in conflict with our international commitments.

The minister accepted the second amendment proposed by the committee. It is a most important amendment in that it permits the person who is the subject of a security certificate to be present during the presentation of the government's case to the judge. Without this amendment the bill would have been clearly contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We very much appreciate the minister's acceptance of this amendment.

The third amendment called for a regular review of the detention of the person who is the subject of a security certificate. The minister says that there is no need for such a review, because the bill provides for the review of the certificate within seven days of filing. Unfortunately, the bill only provides that the review of the certificate should begin within seven days. It might not end for months. Where is the need to detain people who pose no immediate danger to the Canadian public, and where will we put them all, anyway? What the committee recommended would remedy the arbitrary nature of the detention so that only those who pose a danger to the public would be detained or continue to be detained after review. The committee's proposed amendment would bring the provision into compliance with section 9 of the Charter and, again, avoid court challenges, which can only interfere with the effectiveness of the legislation.

The minister's acceptance of the next amendment is also quite important. It gives the Federal Court the right to review the reasonableness of the security certificate as well as the reasonableness of the original decision to issue the certificate.

The minister obviously misunderstood Senate amendment No. 4, because in his statement to the House he said, "The Senate wants us to grant the right to make a refugee claim to persons who have committed a serious crime or who pose a risk to the security of Canada." In fact, that is not what the Senate amendment says. Our amendment kept the exclusion of persons who have committed a serious crime in the bill, although it did remove the security risk exclusion. At the present time such people are allowed to make a claim and, if their claim is successful, then the decision on deportation is made. The problem is that Article 32 of the International Refugee Convention provides that refugees to be expelled should be allowed a reasonable period in which to seek legal admission into another country. There might well be a country willing to accept a Convention refugee under these circumstances, but a person being expelled without a determination that he or she is a Convention refugee has no case to put either to another country or to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The commissioner's representatives advised the committee that they may assist Convention refugees in these cases, but only following determination of their status. A clarification of this misunderstanding may result in a satisfactory solution to the problem.

Now we come to an amendment which has been a major stumbling block in the way of acceptance of this legislation by the witnesses before the committee and, indeed, for many of the members of the committee themselves. The thought of a minister of the Canadian government turning about a ship at sea, without knowledge of who the passengers are, without any assurance that they will ever reach a port of any kind, let alone a port of safety, is surely unthinkable. The minister has gone a long way towards reassuring the members of the committee by agreeing that such an event would only take place upon the order of the minister himself, and he has further undertaken that a minister would only take such action if he could assure himself that there was a safe country willing to accept the human cargo and to provide them with due process of law to prove refugee status if so claimed. That is what is required in accordance with our international commitments, and, indeed, it was Canada which helped to persuade other nations to accept international standards for the treatment of refugees arriving by boat. But, unfortunately, this bill does not include any effective guarantees that the minister's undertakings would be carried out. It may well be that a guarantee might be included to return boats only to countries on the safe country list referred to in Bill C-55. The minister seems to accept that principle in general, but the legislation does not tie it down. It is most important that there be a guarantee of admissibility into the country of destination and an assurance of due process for refugee claimants.

The minister says that this power to turn ships about in mid-ocean "must be retained to send a clear message worldwide that Canada will no longer tolerate abuse of our refugee determination system." I think no member of the committee disagrees with the minister on the desirability of sending such a message. But to whom is this extreme measure sending the message? The owners and captain of the ship who organized the illegal activity and invited refugees to give them their last dollar to slip them ashore in some deserted cove under the most dangerous of conditions? Under this legislation they get away with a mild slap on the wrist—only the human obligation, if they accept it as such, of taking the people to some port where they can disembark. We have no assurance that they or their ship will be arrested or, indeed, that any punishment will ensue.

The people who board these ships are not likely to get any message. They obviously never understood that they were duped. The ship captain could do no more for them than any ordinary airline can do. Surely the message they will get is that they should have spent their money to come by air, to join the backlog of 40,000 refugee claimants who will live in Canada for three to five years before the government will declare another amnesty or succumb to the natural temptation to accept the fact that they have now been here so long that it is unfair to send them away. The message that the government and the people of Canada really want to send is that people arriving and claiming refugee status fraudulently will be quickly identified and deported. If the new procedures proposed in Bill C-55 can be made to work that way, then the Government of Canada will have sent the world the proper message. Then genuine refugees will be welcomed and nurtured and will become productive members of Canadian society, as all their predecessor refugees have over a great many years, and the image of Canada in the free world will remain consistent with its traditions as a country which wants and needs people from anywhere in the world who have had the courage and the persistence to defy their oppressors, to seek a new life for themselves and their children and their children's children in this, the greatest land on earth.

The minister has, again, accepted a very important Senate amendment by agreeing that prosecutions for aiding and abetting undocumented refugee claimants should only be instituted by or with the consent of the Attorney General of Canada. Unfortunately, there are two problems with the sections as they remain. One is that if a refugee claimant without documents is later declared a genuine refugee he may be forgiven the fact that he arrived without documents. However, the individual or group who assisted him in entering the country without documents continues to be guilty of an offence, whether or not the claimant is found to be a genuine refugee. That could be most important to honest-to-goodness humanitarian organizations which do not deal with fraudulent claimants.

The second problem arises from the fact that the minister undertakes that a person who violates the act in the cause of "rendering needed humanitarian assistance to refugees" will not be prosecuted. Unfortunately, no undertaking by a government official or minister is legally binding. People rendering "needed humanitarian assistance to refugees" can be prosecuted under Bill C-84. The Senate amendment is required as a safeguard, and is an accepted legal mechanism for limiting prosecutions. Such an amendment would not change the substance of the bill but would indeed reflect the minister's and the government's expressed intention.

● (1520)

The minister accepted the Senate amendment No. 8, which provides that a search warrant would only be issued where there are reasonable grounds to believe evidence will be found. That amendment brings that section of the act into conformity with the Charter, and, again, it is an extremely important amendment.

The minister has made an acceptable amendment as an alternative to Senate amendment No. 9, and that makes Senate amendment No. 10 unnecessary.

Senate amendment No. 11 proposes a limitation on the power of immigration officers or peace officers to break open doors, windows and locks in their search for vehicles or evidence. The minister feels that no limitation on those powers can be accepted.

The minister misunderstood the intent of Senate amendment No. 12. In his statement in the other place he said, "The Senate also wants to limit the powers of search and seizure to daytime hours." The Senate really only said that the justice of the peace who authorizes a search warrant would have to authorize its execution at night. That is not the same as limiting the search to daytime hours, as the minister says. He is right that trans-border schemes would be conducted mainly at night, but in that case immigration officers already have an immediate right to seize without a warrant the vehicle and any evidence of contravention, according to section 103.01 of the Immigration Act. They do not need a warrant in that case, because it is only a seizure that we are talking about.

The minister accepted the substance of Senate amendment No. 13. The Senate's purpose was to call for regular reviews of the need for detention of individuals, and the minister accepted that principle. He also accepted the requirement that officials inform persons detained of their right to counsel and permit them to obtain such assistance. Again, those are most important amendments to bring this part of the bill into conformity with the Charter.

I do want to thank the minister for his expression of appreciation of the work of the Senate in reviewing the bill and for his generosity in accepting a number of amendments which will greatly improve and strengthen the bill. However, it is clear to me that the job is not yet finished. If the objectives which the minister has outlined, and with which we found general agreement, are to be accomplished, then some further fine tuning is obviously needed. The members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have worked together cooperatively and diligently so far, and I am confident that they will do so in the future if honourable senators deem it advisable to refer this matter again to that committee. I am confident that we will work as closely with the minister as he may wish, to fulfil our responsibilities to the Canadian people, to produce legislation which is constitutionally sound and in keeping with the generous traditions of our great country.

So, honourable senators, I have pleasure in moving:

That the motion, together with the Message from the House of Commons on the same subject, dated 3rd February, 1988, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

MOTION AND MESSAGE FROM COMMONS REFERRED TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault:

That the motion, together with the Message from the House of Commons on the same subject, dated 3rd February, 1988, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, obviously we would much prefer to see the bill passed in its original shape and form, but if it is the majority wish that it go back to committee then certainly we will do nothing to obstruct that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Balfour, moved the third reading of Bill C-91, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CUSTOMS ORDERS VALIDATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the third reading of Bill C-96, to validate certain customs duty orders relating to fresh fruits and vegetables.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about some of the provisions contained in Bill C-96—or, perhaps to put it more accurately, not so much about the provisions of Bill C-96, because, as Senator Barootes has described, they are provisions to validate what is questioned with respect to certain customs orders that were made for a period from 1972 until the present time.

I have no problem with that; but I have an obligation to point out to the Senate, and particularly to the government, that what follows from the use of that delegated legislation, or subordinate statutes—there are many terms—is extremely important to a very important industry in Canada. That is, it gives authority to the Department of Agriculture and its officers to levy certain seasonal tariffs, from time to time, so that we can defend our producers against producers in the United States dumping the tail end of their crops into Canada at very low prices.

It is always that way. Whenever we get to the end of the harvest, producers in the United States try to get rid of those tail ends, and, in many cases, they come to us at a time when our market is just beginning, and therefore our producers have to compete against what it is fair to call dumping—although it does not quite fit the interpretation of dumping in terms of being sold in Canada at a price lower than that at which it is sold in the United States. But it is certainly sold or offered in Canada at a price lower than the average of what was obtained when their marketing season was in full swing.

That is why it is extremely important. I know that Bill C-96 will now give the legal authority needed to validate all of those orders that were brought into question. However, I want Senator Barootes to understand that there are some other things happening, such as this treaty with the United States, which puts this practice—if I might call it that—in jeopardy. I hope that he will understand that he and his government will need to watch very carefully to make sure that they do not put a large sector of our agricultural industry out of business by pulling away those seasonal tariffs that are needed from time to time.

It is fairly reasonable to understand that we want two things: First, we want consumers to have the lowest possible price compatible with the producers' requirement all year long, and therefore there is a long period of time—sometimes as much as 35 or 40 weeks—when no seasonal tariff is required and the fruits and vegetables come into Canada without any duty. That has a purpose, and it is a good one. But there is also a period of weeks—I believe that sometimes it is up to 20—when there is a requirement that this dumping of the tail end of their harvest comes against a seasonal tariff to protect our own producers at the peak of their harvest season.

That is all I wanted to say. It is extremely important that this process be maintained on into the future or we will lose very important and large sectors of production in places such as southwestern Ontario, southern British Columbia and in some areas of the Atlantic provinces, not to mention the greenhouse industry which produces fruits and vegetables across the country. Therefore, there is ample justification for this position, and I hope that Senator Barootes will bear it in mind in the future when the government brings in further amendments to these customs duties in keeping with what is, or appears to be intended, in the Free Trade Agreement.

● (1530)

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to try to reassure the Senate, and in particular Senator Olson, on this very legitimate and reasonable concern which is indeed valid. The point on the protection of our domestic industry during our harvest—which often comes at the tail end of, let us say, the American harvest—has, I am sure, been brought to the attention of all of us at some point in the past.

What is the relationship of this concern to the trade pact between Canada and the United States that may come into existence? I have looked into this matter in anticipation and, indeed, I think I can make three statements which may be reassuring. First, this bill, as Senator Olson has pointed out, relates only to remedial measures from 1972 to 1985 and the inappropriate application of these duties. Second, Bill C-96 has nothing to do with the free trade pact. Third, and this is the most reassuring part, if a Canada-United States trade pact did come into being on January 1, 1989, it states within that pact, under article 702, that a continued protective period for seasonal customs duties will apply for the next 20 years. That will take us into the next century. The agreement also includes a formula for measures that may be applied on a national and regional basis here in Canada, and these measures even take into consideration certain pricing mechanisms which may be beneficial to us.

There is one aspect of the agreement that is not very much discussed and which I should like to bring to the attention of Senator Olson. Beginning January 1, 1988—that is, five or six weeks ago—a harmonization and standardization on the classification of goods has been undertaken with regard to all those goods crossing borders. This measure will be applicable to Canada and the United States, as well as other countries. Canada is a signatory to this measure. I think the points that I have raised provide very good reassurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-83, An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, debate on a bill at second reading stage normally has to do with the principle of the bill, and the details are to be considered in committee. One has little problem in determining the purpose of Bill C-83. In some of its aspects it is little more than a money-grubbing raid on the public treasury in its purpose. However, purpose and principle are not necessarily interchangeable expressions when applied to this bill. As the Honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate has stated, the purpose of the bill is to provide remuneration for members of the House of Commons who, in large number, have special responsibilities.

Funds additional to those already being paid to the House Leader of the New Democratic Party are to be provided, and the deputy whips of the government and the official opposition are already provided for in the existing legislation. This bill also provides for remuneration to the deputy whip of the NDP, under the provision for "a party that has a recognized membership of 12 or more persons in the House of Commons." This is new. New provisions have been introduced for remuneration to the Deputy House Leader of the Official Opposition and the Deputy House Leader of the NDP. The Deputy House Leader of the Government was recently elevated to the office of Minister of State, so he has been looked after.

New provisions are introduced for remuneration to the chairmen of standing committees, chairmen of special committees, those MPs who were on the panel of chairmen of legislative committees, and for the joint chairmen on the Common's side of any standing joint committees. To this point an argument can well be made in support of additional remuneration to those members of the House of Commons serving in those various capacities. I do not make the argument, but I can see that it can be made, convincingly or otherwise.

However, the bill moves on from the sublime to the ridiculous. It is actually proposed that each chairman of the national caucus of each of the three political parties now represented in the House of Commons be paid an annual allowance of $11,900. This is what I referred to at the outset of my remarks as a "money-grubbing raid on the public treasury." The chairman of a national caucus performs no official function in the House of Commons. He has no recognized duties or responsibilities or function of any nature in that chamber. Those I referred to earlier do have recognized, particular duties and responsibilities in the Commons. But I repeat, the chairman of a national caucus of a national party has none. The chairman of a national caucus is a person who is elected by the members of the parliamentary wing of his party to perform a party function, and I remind honourable senators that a national caucus is composed of members of both houses of Parliament, the Senate and the House of Commons. It is only to the members of that caucus that the chairman is answerable and responsible. The office is not an office of the House of Commons.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, the whole proposition of providing remuneration for chairmen of national caucuses is, in my view, ridiculous. Not to put too fine a point on it, this proposal would have moneys paid out of the budget of the House of Commons to national caucus chairmen. I wonder what the members of the House of Commons would do if the chairman of a national caucus happened to be a senator. I do not imagine they would be too excited about paying that senator additional moneys out of the House of Commons budget. I believe that illustrates rather clearly the lack of foresight given to and the slipshod drafting and hasty passage of that sub-clause of Bill C-83.

Some might say that the rules of a caucus would not permit a senator to become its chairman. Honourable senators, the rules of a caucus are not sacrosanct, and they are subject to change. I would remind you that currently the national caucus of the Liberal Party is composed of some 60 senators and 39 members of the House of Commons, so it is entirely possible that a senator could become chairman of the present Liberal national caucus. Come to think of it, it might be the devil of a good idea, and I do not say that entirely with tongue in cheek!

Senator Frith: Just in a devilish way!

Senator McElman: You said it!

Honourable senators, it is not normally our practice in the Senate to interfere with activities or proposals affecting only the House of Commons, as it is not normally the practice of the House of Commons to interfere in matters of concern only to the Senate. However, this is a matter of concern to, and affecting, both houses. In principle, it is not acceptable to place what I consider to be purely party officials on the payroll of Parliament. This provision should be struck out of Bill C-83, in my view.

Next, honourable senators, I believe it would be useful to consider this bill from a somewhat historical perspective. Traditionally, when amendments to or revisions of the laws which apply jointly to both houses of Parliament are proposed, advance informal consultation takes place between the leadership of the two houses. This is the normal, courteous and civilized approach and ensures that the legitimate interests of both houses are met in a cooperative, non-confrontational atmosphere.

As well, it has been traditional that every effort is made to ensure that the elements of equality and fairness in the treatment of the members of both houses are maintained. The term "equality and fairness" does not necessarily, in this situation, mean identical treatment. This traditional approach has been customary when consideration is being given to proposed changes to such acts as the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Honourable senators, in my view there have been two notable exceptions to the practices of advance consultation between the two houses and of equality and fairness. The first had to do with the annual expense allowance for members of both houses. Some 20 years ago it was identical in both houses. However, it was considered that the direct constituency responsibilities of members of the House of Commons required that they have a larger expense allowance. I recall that Senator Croll and I were among those who fought mightily against the change, strictly on the basis of equality of treatment of the members of both houses. It was a battle that was destined to be lost from the outset, and I do not propose to fight it again today. In any event, it was decided that the expense allowance for senators would be established at exactly one-half of that provided for the members of the House of Commons. However, when the formula for annual increases in that amount was devised, an element of unfairness to senators was inadvertently created. It was decided that the actual annual increment would be rounded out at the nearest lower $100. Purely through mathematical computation, the annual expense allowance for senators is now $9,300 while that for members of the House of Commons is $19,400. This means that the annual expense allowance for senators is now $800 below the amount that it should be, in accordance with the original agreement. This anomaly could easily be rectified by a simple amendment, and in fairness this should be attended to when Bill C-83 goes to committee.

The second exception to equality and fairness occurred in 1981 under the former Liberal administration. Amendments were proposed in the House of Commons for revision of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. There was an element of advance informal consultation. However, the government moved the bill very hurriedly through the House of Commons, without providing equality for senators and their surviving spouses. The Senate was also urged to pass the bill forthwith, and a commitment was made that at an early date another bill would be introduced to amend the provisions of that act to have them apply to senators. Honourable senators, that commitment of the former government was not kept.

The result has been that members of the House of Commons enjoy incremental pension benefits at the rate of 5 per cent annually while the annual increment for senators is only 3 per cent. That means that a member of the House of Commons can achieve full pension benefits in 15 years while senators can do so only after 25 years. Because of the requirement in the Senate for retirement at 75 years, many senators cannot acquire maximum pension benefits under the existing formula. That has been grossly unfair to retiring senators over the past seven years and is equally or even more unfair to the surviving spouses of deceased senators, because it affects so greatly the pension rights to which they are entitled.

Honourable senators, I do not raise this subject in an effort to establish linkage with Bill C-83. I am very much opposed to the use of linkage as a pressure tactic in the consideration of legislation. I raise this sorry experience only to impress upon honourable senators that they should now remember the timely admonition: "Once bitten, twice shy." Also, when opportunity knocks—as it is now knocking with the passage in the other place of Bill C-83—we should not miss the opportunity that now rests with us to make changes not with respect to pensions but to this bill.

Honourable senators, we should remind ourselves that it is not very often that we in this house have the opportunity to make changes to the Senate and House of Commons Act. That situation arises only when such a bill comes forward from the other place. There are, of course, limitations on what amendments may be made by the Senate with respect to charges against the Treasury, but there are also ways and means of achieving amendments.

The Senate must decide what it wishes to do concerning the payment of additional remuneration to chairpersons of committees, particularly joint committees. The Senate should decide whether it wishes to provide a large expense allowance for senators who represent the far-flung regions of this great country, as has been done by the Commons for such representatives. I think at once of Senator Willie Adams, Senator Paul Lucier and Senator Charlie Watt, and I favour such action.

The Senate should provide for appropriate remuneration to its Speaker pro tempore. That can only be done through an amendment to this bill, and it is more than justifiable, particularly in light of the constant call to duty of the incumbent.

The Senate should propose an amendment to section 37 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. That is the section dealing with deductions for non-attendance. This provision was made when sessions of Parliament were of approximately one year's duration, and the provision for permitted paid absence up to 21 days per session was reasonable. That is not the case now. We have recently endured a session of almost three and one-half years, which meant that the annual permitted total of days absent was approximately six. We are now in the seventeenth month of the current session. I see no indication that successive governments will return to the former practice of confining each session to approximately one year in length. This section of the act applies to both houses, and it should now be amended.

I am sure that some honourable senators have concerns with respect to other aspects of Bill C-83 and the act that it seeks to amend. The bill should receive careful study and action in committee, and there is time. Bill C-83 was introduced in the Commons on June 30, 1987, with the understanding that it would be immediately sluiced through all stages there. The Senate was expected to do the same. Confusion struck when it was learned that some honourable senators were not prepared to give unanimous consent to such hurried passage here, on that last day when we were so rushed with legislation just before the summer recess.

The Commons, in its confusion, did not proceed with their plan. They backed off. However, the shallow and imperceptive media reported to the Canadian people that the bill had passed, and trumpeted the list of extra payments to scores of MPs as a fait accompli. The bill remained on the Commons order paper until October 16, 1987, when action—rather rapid action—was taken. In quick succession, the spokespersons for the Tories, the Liberals and the ever-pure Socialists, the NDP, rendered their support to the bill. It was whisked off to Committee of the Whole, then back to the House where it was given third reading without further comment.

Honourable senators, that whole process was concluded in a matter of minutes. No doubt one could be excused if one referred to this as an example of unseemly haste. There is no call for such haste in this chamber. Bill C-83 came to us for first reading on October 20 last. It lay fallow on our order paper until the 4th of this month, a period of three and a half months—

Senator MacEachen: No enthusiasm.

Senator McElman: —when the second reading was moved by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. So it is clearly not a matter of urgency here. There is plenty of time for debate and committee study. Let us do it well and let us do it thoroughly.

I suggest to you that Bill C-83 in its present form is unacceptable. From the standpoints of equality for members of both houses, fairness, common courtesy and parliamentary responsibility in creating charges against the Treasury, it is deficient. If it remains unchanged, it should be rejected—defeated by the Senate.

Permit me to close on two notes of attempted humour. First, at the very moment that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Murray, was speaking on second reading of Bill C-83 last Thursday the bells were ringing in the Commons. The reason: The Commons had lost its quorum. At pages 12638 and 12639 of the House of Commons Hansard for February 4, 1988, you will note that not one Tory was present in the House and precious few Grits or Socialists were present. No doubt, all those committee chairpersons, in order to earn their anticipated additional pay, had called simultaneous meetings of their committees and denuded the House of Commons of its members.

Senator Doody: Strategic planning.

Senator McElman: The second bit of humour that I will attempt has to do with the proposed effective date for the amendments proposed in Bill C-83. The Commons proposes that this act be made retroactive to a day in 1987. The date that they propose is April 1, All Fools' Day. How appropriate!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Senator McElman, I would like to ask a question. I realize that you do not need any assistance from me, and I certainly do not want to alienate my colleagues, but, in those areas of this bill which are unacceptable, did you not forget one principle with respect to the old theory of bribery and corruption and what this payment to committees may do with respect to the influence of the Prime Minister, the choice of committees, and the independence of committee chairmen?

Senator Frith: A point well taken, and taken by exactly the right person.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I have heard that point discussed and I have no doubt that it will be further discussed in the course of this debate. Therefore, I leave it to those who are better qualified than I.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator McElman relating to joint chairmanship. When there is a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons and there are joint chairmen, does this mean that the joint chairman of the House of Commons would get paid and the joint chairman of the Senate would not get paid?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, as the bill is now drawn, that would be the case. There is no provision in the bill whatsoever for consideration of anything, including remuneration, for any member of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Côtte, for Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doyle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Grafstein).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Grafstein has yielded to Senator Marsden.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Thank you, honourable senators. Senator Grafstein is unable to be here today, and we both have an interest in this legislation.

That the Canadian copyright legislation is in need of revision is not in question from our side of the chamber. As Senator Doyle pointed out in his delightful speech, there are a good many reasons why the 1924 copyright legislation needs to be further amended. We agree entirely that the rights of creators need protection and, in some cases, expansion. We recognize that the categories of creators to be protected by copyright have gone well beyond artists, scholars and the creators of what Senator Doyle calls articles, gimcracks and what-have-you, to software, recorded film and music, and other articles arising from a variety of new and rapidly expanding technologies.

However, this legislation is complicated. In the other place some excellent points were raised in briefs from experts representing a very wide number of groups, both creators and users; from lawyers who work in copyright law; and from many people whose economic fortunes will be changed or may be changed by this legislation. Because, as I will emphasize in a moment, this is only step one in a series of copyright changes and deals principally with creators' rights, users must wait for the other shoe to drop in a subsequent piece of legislation, which we have not yet seen, and which has the potential to allay, or perhaps enhance, the fears of users and, in some aspects, creators. There are echoes of tax reform here.

In his speech last Thursday, February 4, Senator Doyle indicated some of the problems with this bill. He mentioned sins of omission as well as sins of commission. For example, he commented on the possibility of copyright being used as a means of destruction rather than as a means of protection. The example he gave was of the movie industry in the U.S.A., where destruction of film does occur under copyright. The film industry and other cultural industries in Canada are in an era of explosive growth and need better protection. I am sure that the committee of the Senate will consider the interests of those in the movie, video, music and other related industries who have an interest in this bill, and when they do so Senator Grafstein will wish to have something to say on these matters, on which he is expert—as I am not.

We look forward to the hearings which the Senate committee will hold on this complicated bill. At the very least, it will be a rich and rapid education for senators in this vital part of Canadian life and culture.

But I hope it will be much more than that. It should be a process of serious and careful weighing in the balance which must exist between creators and users, an examination of a symbiotic relationship which is currently out of balance. In addition, I trust that the viewpoints aired in our committee will be better balanced as between one interest and another than was the case in the committee of the other place. There are so many groups with interest in this bill, and their concerns are so diverse and subtle, that I cannot possibly put before you today the full range of concerns, and I will not try to do so. Let me simply raise a few examples.

One of the most contentious issues raised in the other place, and for which the opposition critic, Ms. Finestone, argued for an amendment, concerns the retroactive provisions of this bill. Retroactivity is always a matter of concern in legislation.

In her speech in the other place, which I commend to all senators for its comprehensiveness, clarity and reasonableness, Ms. Finestone quoted from a letter sent by the law firm Ogilvy, Renaud to the Minister of Communications and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. They said:

—the retroactivity created by Section 24 of the Bill is without precedent and unconscionable. Today, the law is clear that a course of action exists for infringement by the copying of a functional article and in many instances parties have instituted such proceedings before the Courts based on copyright. To abolish retroactively this cause of action would expose these persons to damages and costs for having relied on the law as it is today.

Honourable senators will want to take very seriously such concerns.

Those interested in education, such as the School Trustees Association of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, among others, have raised a number of profoundly disturbing questions. I wish to state quite categorically, and all honourable senators will know, that no one in the educational sector wishes to deny copyright benefits to creators, whether of print, software, or anything else, and there is a high degree of sensitivity to the problems of pirating and violation of copyright which may exist. But the desire to resolve these problems must be balanced against the concerns of scholars, teachers and researchers, and the educational institutions to prepare properly the coming generation of Canadians for this hi-tech world and to preserve properly the rights of scholars and researchers.

The committee will want to hear from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada on the issue of the fugitive literature for research purposes, a matter not covered by the solution proposed in this bill to manage copyright—that is, collectives.

There is distress, as well, about the ambiguities on single-copy access in libraries, or, indeed, in the copying machine in the Senators' Reading Room, under the "fair dealing" provisions which will be determined in the light of availability. Collectives do not resolve this problem. Reproductive collectives may be very useful in many aspects, but may also serve seriously to restrict inter-library loans. This matter is not an esoteric one, only a complicated one, which needs to be better resolved than it is in the bill before us.

The Post Graduate Students Association has been in touch with me to raise a matter which I know to be one of concern to many. This is the statute of limitations clause of this bill, which, in this bill, is set at three years—that is, there are three years available to complain about infringement of copyright. The average length of time required to obtain a PhD in some fields is well beyond that period. For Social Sciences and Humanities it is currently an average of six years, and the range is much greater. Students and their advisers work closely together, and rarely, but often enough for cases to be notorious, one or the other complains that the ideas have been published in advance of the thesis. Usually, since this is a very unequal relationship of power, it is the student who is the aggrieved party. The Graduate Students Association has pointed out that the British law on copyright has a six-year statute of limitations, and proposes the same here. That should be carefully examined.

Particular concerns arise in the matter of exhibition rights. The Canadian Museums Association and the Professional Art Dealers Association of Canada have raised a matter of grave consequence, because it appears that exhibition rights have not been well thought through in this legislation. The Minister of Culture and Communications of Ontario, the Honourable Lily Munro, said in a letter to the federal sponsoring ministers:

We feel that the possible implications of these amendments (concerning exhibition rights) have not been fully assessed and may be too far reaching. Art Galleries and museums not only have a role in providing public access to creative works but also, in many cases, have education objectives to which they must adhere.

The minister goes on to state:

Interpretation of collections is an essential part of the curatorial responsibility of such institutions and provides an educational experience for the viewer, particularly in an historical context. The introduction of an exhibition right, as stated in Bill C-60, would alter this historically established balance between creators and the institutions.

It appears that the Professional Art Dealers Association of Canada agrees with this matter, as do the museums.

Furthermore, as these bodies have pointed out, there are alternatives which would protect the economic interests of creators, which means are already used in Canada, and which can be achieved without legislative change; that is, the exhibition rights in clause 2 of this bill could be withdrawn for further consideration and creators still be financially compensated. Let me explain.

Senators will have noticed a recent press release from the Minister of Communications, one of the ministers responsible for this bill, announcing additional funding for the Public Lending Rights Commission's program for 1987-88. Through this means payments are made to authors registered with the PLRC. This is a popular, non-legislated means of helping creators. It works for authors and could work for those affected by exhibition rights. I refer senators to the speech of Ms. Finestone in which she listed a number of other important measures in the area of tax laws, for example, and which can be used to compensate creators and ensure their livelihood without the awkwardness created in Bill C-60 before us.

Collectives are proposed as a method for administering copyright, and are already established and working well in some fields, such as the music recording industry, and some regions, such as in the province of Quebec. In other jurisdictions, such as France and Britain, collectives are established under different circumstances from the ones proposed here. Collectives strike me as a good solution, but by no means a perfect solution. It is incumbent upon us to consider the exceptions to perfection—some of which I mentioned in my comments a minute ago. The Canadian Musical Reproduction Rights Agency is such a collective, which has been in operation for ten years licensing musical works to record companies, film and television producers on behalf of music publishers and composers. They are most willing and anxious to explain their operations to senators, and would, in my opinion, provide a good example of how collectives work.

• (1610)

However, there is a different point of view on some of these rights. The private broadcasters, represented by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, have serious matters to raise. For example, new technology in their industry has dramatically changed the situation with respect to copyright. They ask for an exemption to the mechanical reproduction rights provision, or, alternatively, for ephemeral broadcasting rights. Ephemeral broadcasting rights sounds positively heavenly, but they turn out to mean taped broadcasts delayed for a variety of reasons such as time zones.

Senator Frith: Quite secular and not at all sacred!

Senator Marsden: Yes. The broadcasters have a number of serious concerns such as the matter of "fair use," for example. If someone being interviewed has music playing in the background, will that expose them to liability under this act? It appears that it may.

Broadcasters also point out that they are placed in double jeopardy by this bill, because one law requires them to keep logger tapes of their broadcasts for a certain number of days while this bill means that they will be violating copyright by doing so.

Let me repeat again that software creators have genuinely important concerns for protection, which are well known and often commented upon in the popular press. These concerns for protection must be addressed, as must the protection of many other creators.

Many of the concerns of users would be relieved if the second or any subsequent bills could come forward even in draft form. They have been promised. The Minister of Communications, when she introduced this legislation last May, promised that the users' rights bill would be ready in the fall of 1987. At the end of 1987 she promised it this spring. In his speech Senator Doyle referred to the fall as the likely time for the presentation of this legislation. In a compelling brief the Social Science Federation of Canada has pointed out the grave difficulties the delay in introducing the second bill raises, including the havoc which may possibly be created in many important national institutions, and urges us to "postpone passage of Bill C-60 until all interested parties have had an opportunity to consider amendments to the Copyright Act in their totality." I must say that I agree entirely with the Social Science Federation of Canada on this matter, and hope that the Senate committee will seriously consider this.

Having said that, I am also of the view that creators' rights are now, and have been for too long, in jeopardy through inadequate protection. It is my view that there is what would be called in industrial relations a "win-win" situation here. That is, people want creators' rights protected and creators want users' rights protected. This is not a parasitic but a symbiotic relationship, or it should be that. However, in many instances it has been parasitic for creators. It should be the purpose of this bill and its companion bill to create the balance of symbiosis, which would cause the sectors of our community and economy involved in and touched by this bill to grow and prosper.

For our part, we will be looking for that symbiotic relationship to be enhanced and improved in this bill. We look forward to hearing from any groups. Many of those who appeared in front of the committee in the other place have telephoned or written to say that events have changed and their views have developed as the bill was amended before we received it. This will not, therefore, be mere repetition of what has been heard before but a development of ideas which one hopes will be helpful to the government as well as to those affected by this bill in Canada and to Canadians more generally.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Doyle, I urge second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Doyle, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if the committee is ready to come to order, there are certain motions required as a result of the previous decisions of the Committee of the Whole regarding the establishment of a Submissions Group. It was decided that the Submissions Group would be receiving its instructions from the Committee of the Whole as to who would be heard by the Submissions Group.

The Submissions Group intends to have its next sitting on Monday, February 29, 1988. As it is not likely that the Senate will be sitting before that, I asked whether the Committee of the Whole could meet today to give its instructions to the Submissions Group.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That the following groups and individuals be heard by the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, namely:

I should say, Mr. Chairman, that this motion is the result of consideration by the steering committee as to the number of persons who have asked to appear before the Committee of the Whole, some of whom might more appropriately appear before the Submissions Group. The motion first refers to the groups and individuals to be heard by the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. They are the following:

Professor Ramsay Cook
Honourable H. Carl Goldenberg
Public Service Alliance of Canada
Honourable Donald J. Johnston, P.C., MP
Mr. I. Asper
Canadian Nurses Association
Mr. A.W. Johnson
Metis National Council
Right Honourable Pierre E. Trudeau, P.C.
Honourable Lowell Murray, P.C., Senator

I understand from you, Mr. Chairman, that these are the names that should be assigned to the Committee of the Whole, but it is not necessarily established that all of them will be appearing. However, if they appear, they will appear before the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: That is correct.

Senator Frith: And further:

That the Honourable Robert Bourassa, Premier of the Province of Quebec, and the Honourable Gil Rémillard, Minister of International Relations and Minister Responsible for Canadian Intergovernmental Affairs (Province of Québec), be invited to appear before the Committee of the Whole;

● (1620)

Mr. J. Mackay; and

That the Chairman, after the usual consultation, be authorized to submit the names of other groups or individuals to appear before the Submissions Group and the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: If any honourable senator does not have a copy of this list, would he or she please so indicate?

Senator Bielish: I do not have it.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a matter for clarification.

The Chairman: If it is not on a point of order, I would point out that Senator Doody and Senator Phillips have their hands up on a point of order.

Senator Frith: Perhaps you, Mr. Chairman, could explain the last paragraph of the motion and any other matters which may arise.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, in answer to Senator Frith, you indicated that those first listed, starting with Professor Ramsay Cook and ending with Senator Murray, have not yet agreed to appear before the committee. The next paragraph in the motion suggests that several persons be invited to appear before the Committee of the Whole. Why should we not say that everyone should be invited to appear before the Committee of the Whole?

Senator Frith: I may have misled you on that point. These people all asked to appear or were invited to appear. I am simply saying that since that time it apparently has not been established exactly whether all of them are going to appear or on what dates they are going to appear.

What I am saying is that the motion is that they be heard, if they wish to be heard, rather than offering a guarantee that they are going to be heard.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I want to comment on the list as presented to us.

At the steering committee meeting this morning the majority of the senators present felt that this was the correct procedure to follow, and I have no quarrel with it; indeed, I agree that as many as possible should be heard by the Submissions Group to save time so that we can devote more time to other duties here in the chamber.

However, I did express the opinion in committee that all of those people whose names are included in the group to be invited to appear before the Committee of the Whole need not have been, and that many of them could have been heard in the other place. However, that opinion did not carry. The majority view carried, and that is the situation as we have it before us now.

Senator Phillips: I am rather intrigued by the manner in which this select list was made up. I am surprised to see the name of Mr. Asper, although I think I have heard tell of him. However, I then see the name of Mr. A.W. Johnson, and I am not sure I can distinguish between the Johnsons on the list.

I have one strenuous objection, Mr. Chairman, and that is that the mover of the motion, the Deputy Leader of the Liberal Party in the Senate, has selected Mr. Asper, a former leader of the Liberal Party in Manitoba, over the Acadian Society in New Brunswick. I find it insulting to Acadians of New Brunswick to be relegated or shunted off to the Submissions Group while the leader of the Liberal Party in Manitoba receives the full treatment. He is invited to appear on the floor of the Senate. The Acadians are not being allowed to come on to the floor of the Senate—they are shunted off to a committee room. I think that is an insult to the Acadians of New Brunswick.

Senator Argue: Move that it be changed!

Senator Phillips: I am surprised that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition would move a motion of this nature. I hope he will correct that and show the Acadians the respect they deserve.

Senator Argue: I understood from a conversation I had with Larry Brown, the Secretary Treasurer of the National Union of Provincial Government Employees, that he was slated to appear before the Senate. I do not see his name here. My question is: If he cared to make a submission, would he be able to make that submission even though his name does not appear on this list at the moment?

The Chairman: I stand to be corrected on this, but I believe that group was approached to see if they could appear on the available dates and the response was that they had a convention at that time and could not attend. They did, in fact, make a request.

Senator Argue: I do not see that name on the list.

The Chairman: I have just noticed that the name of that association appears on page 3. They will appear on February 29.

Senator Argue: That was my error.

Senator Marsden: While I understand the necessity for this procedure, I am very distressed to see that the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, the National Council of Women of Canada, and the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women are not to be heard in the Committee of the Whole.

They were not heard properly at the joint committee. There have been constitutional and other events since then that mean, it seems to me, that their testimony is going to be far more important to the development of this committee's thinking than we necessarily recognize. I am not opposing any of those who have been chosen, but I do notice that we have only three chances out of 13 to hear from people who are not white, able-bodied male. If the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Canadian Nurses Association, and the Metis National Council are good enough to have the Committee of the Whole addressed by women, we will hear from women, but otherwise we will not hear from them at all, and I strenuously object to this.

Senator Frith: The interventions by Senator Phillips, the new champion of the Acadians—

Senator Phillips: That is an honour.

Senator Frith: —and Senator Marsden were both based on the assumption that there was something second rate about not appearing before the Committee of the Whole, and that anyone who did not appear before the Committee of the Whole was the subject of some “shunting” operation. That is just not so. There are different reasons for persons being heard by the Submissions Group, and they have nothing to do with being second rate, and it is not a “siding”—if I may use a noun that would follow the “shunting” verb used by Senator Phillips. The reasons vary. In some cases it is for the convenience of the people themselves. If it turns out that after this list has been adopted, as I hope it will be, some people find that it is more convenient for them, if we find it more convenient for the Senate itself, and if everyone would be happier with their appearing before the Committee of the Whole, they may. This is a working list. The reasons for the division are not all the same. In some cases, as, for example, was the case for the group referred to by Senator Argue, it was for the convenience of the group itself, and not for the convenience of the Senate.

In any event, I hope that honourable senators will not approach this matter as being some discriminatory motion. It is simply meant to harness the Submissions Group that the Senate agreed to set up. That is the reason for the motion.

● (1630)

Senator Doody: I just want to say, Mr. Chairman, that my intervention was not aimed at bringing people from the Submissions Group into the main body of the church, as it were. My hope was that more of the people on the first list would find it convenient to be heard by the Submissions Group. The intention is not that one list is superior or inferior to the other. This Submissions Group list was simply drawn up to provide more time in the Senate chamber for the Senate's work.

This is not a new position I am taking here. I am sure most senators are tired of listening to me, but I think that the Senate as a body should be devoted to the work of the chamber as a constituent house of Parliament, and that committee work should be done in committee rooms. Therefore, I feel that the more people are heard by the Submissions Group the more expeditiously and efficiently we can deal with the business of the Senate. To that end, I was hoping that people on the first list could be transferred to the second. Obviously that is not going to happen, so I am quite prepared to live with it as it is.

The Chairman: If I might make a comment at this point, one of the reasons for the last paragraph on page 4 was to permit that sort of juggling, because we do have a problem in terms of scheduling. When we have to put everything through the steering committee, sometimes we find it difficult, because we cannot get a quorum, as was the case today. There could indeed be some juggling done when we speak to various people who have asked to appear.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, on the list of groups being granted permission to appear on the Senate floor I find the Canadian Nurses Association, but on the list of those appearing before the Submissions Group I find the National Federation of Nurses Union. Since they are both national associations and both represent the same profession, could the mover of the motion tell us how he made the distinction between them?

Senator Frith: As I said earlier, the selection was not based upon whether an organization was national or regional. Perhaps in this case it was for the convenience of one of the groups. I am not familiar with each individual decision in terms of the selection, but I know that it was not meant to be done on any discriminatory basis. Perhaps one of the groups preferred to appear before a smaller committee. If Senator Phillips wishes to press this point, I will have to ask the chairman or the staff of the steering committee to look into it. I can answer him only on the basis of the general principle.

The point he has raised is, I think, a valid one. He has drawn to our attention the fact that of two national bodies representing the same profession one will appear before the Committee of the Whole and one before the Submissions Group. That has given me an opportunity to explain the general basis of the selection.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Chairman, one of the distinctions which could be ironed out is this: The great advantage of the Committee of the Whole process is that in our debates the next day the testimony is already printed. Anyone who has tried to get the testimony from committees of this chamber or from joint committees will know that much of it disappears into obscurity for weeks on end. Is it the intention to publish all of the presentations to the Submissions Group in Debates of the Senate the day after they appear?

The Chairman: I believe that those groups will be treated the same as groups appearing before any committee, and that there will be a verbatim report of the committee's proceedings.

Senator Marsden: I must say that in that way I do think this proves to be a disadvantage to those people who are closely following this procedure and to those groups who wish to make presentations to the Committee of the Whole and cannot. The rationale behind the placing of some groups on one list and others on another list is not at all clear to me, I must say. I would be happier if the steering committee came back to us with that rationale more fully explained. However good the intentions of the steering committee, I can assure honourable senators that it will be very badly received among women's groups in this country.

Senator Frith: If I may deal with that intervention, in my opinion, if we are going to try in Committee of the Whole to settle each individual case and come up with an impeccable list of criteria for selection, we will be here a long time getting it settled. I repeat what the chairman has said, that the reason for the last paragraph is to provide for changes through consultation with the chairman rather than in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Marsden: Does that mean that your advice is to lobby the chairman as hard as we can?

Senator Lucier: It works!

Senator Frith: My advice is to consider the comparative advantages of appearing before the Committee of the Whole—one of which is that outlined by Senator Marsden—and those of appearing before the Submissions Group. Those appearing before the Submissions Group will probably be assured of an earlier appearance, perhaps more time and perhaps better publicity. These things could be discussed with anyone who wants a change made, and that could then be taken up with the chairman.

Senator Bielish: My question, Mr. Chairman, is with regard to the second item under "Alberta," on the first page. It reads: "Mr. Preston Manning, Reform Party of Canada, Indian Association of Alberta." Is Mr. Manning from the Reform Party of Canada appearing together with the Indian Association of Alberta?

Senator Frith: That is a good question; I don't know the answer.

The Chairman: I believe that is a typographical error, senator, but I can verify that.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should place the Indian Association of Alberta on another line.

The Chairman: Yes. Thank you, Senator Bielish, for bringing that to our attention. Is it agreed that we put the Indian Association of Alberta on a separate line?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Editor's note: Correction made.)

Senator Robertson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if this is the final list of witnesses and whether it includes everyone who wrote and requested to be heard.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, this list includes everyone who has requested to be heard and has indicated they still want to be heard up to the present time, and that the only additions or changes that can be made will be made in accordance with the last paragraph.

Senator Robertson: Therefore, we are hearing everyone who asked to be heard.

The Chairman: That was the basis on which the list was made up. Those people who asked to be heard are on the list, with one exception—some had asked to be heard and they then notified us that they could not appear.

Is there any further discussion? Honourable senators, the question before the committee is the motion by the Honourable Senator Frith. I presume it is not necessary for me to read the motion—

Senator Frith: Dispense.

The Chairman:—regarding the presentations before the Committee of the Whole and the Submissions Group. The motion is seconded by Senator Côtteau. Are senators ready for the question? Those in favour?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Against?

I declare the motion carried.

● (1640)

Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, March 2, 1988.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe Senator Molgat suggested that the Submissions Group would meet on February 29. Is it necessary to get permission for the Submissions Group to sit even though the Senate may not be sitting? I am merely asking the question.

Senator Frith: All standing committees have the right to sit even though the Senate may not be sitting. I am wondering whether in this case permission is needed.

Senator Doody: The Submissions Group clearly is not a standing committee.

Senator Molgat: I believe that the Submissions Group has the right to do so; but if there is any question, with leave of the Senate, I move:

That the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord be authorized to sit on 29th February—

Senator Doody: —or at any time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: —or at any time it likes.

Senator Molgat: Yes. At any time the Senate is not sitting. So my motion is:

That the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord be authorized to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 1, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 2754)

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE AT A RECEPTION HELD IN THE SPEAKER'S CHAMBERS ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1988 ON THE OCCASION OF THE RETIREMENT OF THE HONOURABLE SENATORS A. IRVINE BARROW AND JEAN LE MOYNE

---

Honourable colleagues,
Ladies and gentlemen,

Senator Barrow is favoured with so many fine qualities that I hardly know where to begin.

Should I tell you of his ability in financial matters? Should I speak about his success in the accountancy field, or about his generous support of volunteer work? Or should it be about his devotion to the democratic society?

Since we are gathered to say farewell to Senator Barrow, after his nearly fourteen years in our midst, and since I am most familiar with his performance as a member of the Senate, I will put the emphasis on the last aspect.

It is a truism that many people take democracy for granted and believe that it will last forever without any personal involvement in the machinery, in the rouage of political process. We are privileged in Canada to live in a pluralist society, and we owe this, in part, to the existence of our different political parties. And it is thanks to people like Senator Barrow that these parties are healthy and continue to offer us alternative points of view. Genuinely devoted to his political beliefs, yet philosophically active and open, he is a staunch believer in our way of life and he acts in accord with his principles.

For these and many other reasons, Senator Barrow is a man—a gentleman—who inspires confidence and respect. His bearing suggests that, with him, one is standing on firm ground. He never seems to be in a hurry because his homework is always done on time. Those of us who have served with him on the Internal Economy Committee have had reason to be grateful to him for his superb chairmanship of the Budgets Subcommittee—a task many would consider a thankless one.

And in the Chamber, when he addressed the Senate, we knew that each word was well chosen and accounted for. It would never have come to the mind of his colleagues to ask him to filibuster! We shall indeed miss his short and pertinent remarks that synthesized the questions, and his sharp mind which reminded everyone to avoid futilities. Often his presence alone, or his eloquent silence, had the effect of calling the Senate to order. With people like him, there is even less need for a Speaker!

On the federal scene, Senator Barrow's innate qualities and wide expertise and experience were recognized when he was appointed a director of the Bank of Canada and of the Industrial Development Bank. If you travel in his province, you will discover that Irvine Barrow is not a chartered accountant of Halifax only, but of all Nova Scotia. His clientele is spread all over, in important cities, in important companies—the well-off people, but don't count on him to give names. He is a knowledgeable accountant and a reliable and discreet man.

And, in the economic field, Senator Barrow was not simply an accountant. He was an entrepreneur and, like all real businessmen, he took risks. Whereas John Kenneth Galbraith described our times as "the world of uncertainties", our colleague was not afraid to take risks, becoming one of the pioneers of the then new and uncertain area of cablevision. Naturally, Senator Barrow not being a mindless adventurer, every aspect had been carefully studied, and the company was a tremendous success.

Finally, I would like to mention the countless professional and community associations to which he has devoted his time and efforts. He does not publicize it but I am sure that his contribution to their activities is crucial to their vitality and success, for he does nothing by half-measures.

Dear colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, as I am sure you will agree, our institution should seek to attain political neutrality! You have discovered that Irvine Barrow is constantly progressive, realistically conservative and spiritually liberal. These few words were meant to make you realize that he is the prototype of a senator!

Dear colleague, you know now why your departure will be so regretted. Best wishes in your new life.

(Applause)

Honourable colleagues,
Ladies and gentlemen:

As you can imagine, when I sat down to prepare this tribute to our colleague, Jean Le Moyne, I got out my dictionaries.

It is by no means an easy task to honour so active a senator on the occasion of his retirement, and for someone whose area of expertise is finance, it might well be considered foolhardy to risk a few comments about a man of letters.

I hesitated for a long time before jotting down some notes, because I knew that nothing I could say would do justice to this essayist, critic, writer, polemicist and political scientist. This man, who is capable of grasping the most profound theology, the most abstruse philosophy and the most futuristic principles of mechanology, was not afraid at the end of one career to move on to the political arena, which must sometimes have reminded him of the Tower of Babel.

To the astonishment of his Liberal colleagues, this septuagenarian, a political neophyte, took to his new responsibilities so well that he had scarcely been sworn in when he was elected caucus chairman. It was a revelation for everyone, and especially for Senator Le Moyne.

When I learned the news, I wondered if the Liberal senators had not secretly wanted to protect themselves from the sharp tongue of this champion of justice by confining him to the neutrality of the chairmanship. Had he had the right to speak, he would undoubtedly have reminded them of all the mistakes they had made during their too lengthy tenure.

Be that as it may, Senator Le Moyne participated faithfully in all the activities of this house. We all observed that he was capable of being an attentive, albeit often impatient, listener. We were also privileged to experience some of his sudden changes of mood, at which time he would amuse or enlighten spectators and make his absent targets tremble.

We will not soon forget his vivid comments in the course of a debate which could be qualified as theological, since it focussed on organized religion. Given his name, which in English means "the monk", we expected him to leap to the defence of Opus Dei. How wrong we were! It was like seeing Léon Bloy rebuking the moneychangers in the Temple, a temple whose pillars would have crumbled had Opus Dei found refuge therein. Others heard echoes of Bernanos' "Sous le Soleil de Satan". Even the philippics of Demosthenes seemed to pale in comparison with the tirades of our eminent senator.

But I must not leave you with the false impression that as a senator Jean Le Moyne excelled only in diatribes, although we gave him ample opportunity. Whenever the occasion warranted, he could exalt us with his eloquence. Who can forget his courageous, inspiring contribution to the debate on the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss"?

In a speech worthy of an academic, he recognized democracy's wisdom in taking the risk of allowing its cultural agencies freedom of action. His remarks were so steeped in the British tradition of fair play that his comments were reproduced in their entirety in the most recent issue of the journal of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Just recently, I wanted to tell our colleague how highly we thought of him. I told him that he deserved to have a school of philosophy named after him—a school that believed in demonstrating the truth rather than in expounding edifying theories. Since I was speaking to a philosopher and philologist, I raised myself up to his level and said, quite simply: "My dear Jean, thanks to you, the name Le Moyne has become the eponym of assertoric statements which eschew apodictic propositions." His reply was: "Finally, I understand you!"

My dear colleague, from what I have said you must surely realize how sorry we are to see you leave us so soon. However, we can take comfort from thinking that rarely has the Senate benefited from so great a contribution in so short a time.

We wish you an enjoyable and productive retirement.

(Applause)

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 1, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

XV OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

TRIBUTE TO PEOPLE OF CALGARY

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I rise at this time to say a few words to mark the end of the XV Olympic Winter Games that took place over the past two weeks in Calgary. I believe what occurred during the games was important for Canada and especially important for my home city of Calgary. When considering what I might say on this occasion, I thought I would not mention any names. As you all know, the games were hosted by the City of Calgary and by some 10,000 or more volunteers who did all the work that resulted in the success that all of us saw, including those who were able to visit the city of Calgary and those who watched the events on television. However, it has occurred to me that certain names should be mentioned, because they are symbolic of what the games were about, what we tried to achieve, and what we did achieve.

I think the most important person to mention is Robyn Perry, who was the 12-year-old girl who lit the Olympic flame at the beginning of the games. She is important because she is symbolic of the future, symbolic of what the Olympics are about, and symbolic of what we in Canada realize deep down but talk little about in terms of what is very important to us, and that is our future. Our future is people like Robyn Perry. Another name that should not go unmentioned is that of Frank King, chairman of the Organizing Committee. He is symbolic of the determination and hard work that went into having Calgary selected as the site of the XV Olympic Winter Games and for making them the success they were. Another name that should be mentioned, because of his involvement from the beginning, is that of the Mayor of Calgary, Mr. Ralph Klein. I think he is symbolic of the friendliness of Calgary and of the determination of its citizens to be good hosts, not only on the occasion of the Olympic Games but on all occasions.

It is difficult to express why the events were important. They were about respect for the individual, about friendship, about the energy of a people, about the energy of a community, about success, and about doing one's best—all of which describe what happened in Calgary during the two magic weeks just past. It was one of those events that are too good to last; it had to end. However, it is an event that will live in my memory and, I believe, in the memories of all those who were involved and all those who were spectators, whether they were actually in Calgary, in another part of Canada or in another part of the world. It was a special time. It was a time that we shall remember for the rest of our lives. It will be a reference point for me, and I am sure for others, in measuring what is success. As a result of the games, my community will benefit in a material way, but I think it will benefit most from the spiritual legacy of the games. Most of all, the experience was about celebration.

I merely wanted to share those thoughts with honourable senators. I find language an imperfect tool to convey something as important to us as the celebration of the XV Olympic Winter Games in Calgary these past two weeks.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89—PRIVY COUNCIL VOTE 15—REFERRAL TO JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANADA

Tuesday, February 23, 1988

Ordered,—That Privy Council Vote 15, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1989 be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Attest

ROBERT MARLEAU
The Clerk of the House of Commons

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, perhaps someone at some stage—and not necessarily right now—could explain just how that reference can go directly to a joint committee without going through the Senate. I know there is a reason for it, but I would like to see it on the record.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a like motion:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in Privy Council Vote 15 of the Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1989; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Therefore, both houses make the same motion and jointly refer the vote.

Senator Frith: Yes, but that is not what this last message from the House of Commons says. They want to say that they, I take it, on the other side have referred it by motion.

Senator Doody: No, it has that effect, but the message is quite clear:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

It informs the House of Commons that we, the Senate, have referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages the expenditures set out in Privy Council Vote 15 of the Estimates. And the motion further states:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Senator Frith: I just think it would be much more communicative if, instead of using the passive form of the verb, the writer of the notice used the active form and said:

... to inform the Senate that the House of Commons has referred Privy Council Vote 15—

Senator Doody: I have no problem with that, honourable senators. We can check with the officers at the Table, but I assume that this has been a standard procedure. However, like most things, it is open to improvement.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Perhaps I could read the text that was received by the Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. Robert Marleau:

That Privy Council Vote 15, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1989 be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Senator Frith: I suggest that next time the message should state that the House of Commons has referred such-and-such a matter.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED— REPORT OF TASK FORCE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to bring forward the following order for Wednesday, March 2, 1988:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the first and final report of the Senate Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention at this time to deal with the substance of the report, except to say that the conclusions and recommendations arrived at in the report are the result of intensive meetings held in the North that brought forth very deeply-held views.

The members of the committee listened to the presentations carefully, but the final conclusions and recommendations are those of the members of the committee, after having heard those presentations.

I want to express my particular thanks to the members of the committee. They were, undoubtedly, the most cooperative group with whom I have ever had the pleasure to work. They spent countless hours listening to presentations and working on the report.

I also want to thank all the members of the staff, thanks to whom this report was produced in-house. The committee budget came in substantially below that which was forecast, and for that I also thank the members of the staff.

I have one apology to make, because a senator has approached me on the subject. In order to accommodate the people of the North, we held meetings on weekends. I was told subsequently that the committee should not have held meetings on Sundays. If that offended anyone, then I apologize for that. It was an attempt to accommodate the people from those regions.

Honourable senators, if there is no discussion on the report at this time, shall the committee rise, report progress and ask for leave to sit again?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

EXPENDITURE OF NEW MONEY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

We all recall that the Prime Minister announced the funding for the agency in June 1987 in St. John's, Newfoundland, indicating that the sum of more than $1 billion would be made available for the next five years. Today we read in the newspapers that the four Atlantic premiers are seeking a meeting with the Prime Minister to discuss the agency.

One of the allegations referred to in the article, presumably made by Premier Buchanan, is to the effect that no new money has been expended since the original announcement. Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether that allegation is correct?

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I announced on February 15 considerable expansion of the authorities that the agency would have to spend money by way of loans, loan guarantees, interest rate buy-downs, loan insurance, and so forth, for the purpose of assisting small- and medium-sized businesses in the Atlantic provinces and also for assisting non-commercial enterprises engaged in providing services to business enterprises. If the money has not been flowing, it will certainly be flowing very shortly.

As I indicated at the time, we have every reason to believe, on the basis of the applications that have been coming forward and the interest that has been shown by the business community in the Atlantic provinces, that we will have committed at least $100 million in a very short period of time.

Senator MacEachen: I infer from the minister's statement or reply that new authority has been established as of February 15 to facilitate or accelerate expenditures, but that up to that time apparently no new money was expended. It certainly appears that the optimism expressed by the Prime Minister in St. John's in June 1987, when he said that he had asked Don McPhail when the agency would be open for business and was given the answer "tomorrow morning," was unfounded, and that "tomorrow morning" did not come until February 1988. However, let us put that aside.

Senator Murray: Don't put that aside, I will come to it in a moment.

Senator MacEachen: Please do.

Senator Frith: Right now, not tomorrow.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the agency did open for business immediately. The honourable senator, I trust, will recall that the first step taken by the government and the Prime Minister was to transfer to the agency a number of the existing programs, including the IRDP, the Atlantic Enterprise Program, Enterprise Cape Breton, the Small Business Loans Act as it operates in the Atlantic provinces, and a number of other programs, programs which, I may say, had been found by the business community in the Atlantic provinces to be heavily bureaucratized and, indeed, strangling in red tape.

The Prime Minister instructed us to to cut the red tape, simplify the process, and decentralize the administration of those programs. We set about doing that immediately after June 6, and we have succeeded rather dramatically. Indeed, in the period since June 6, because of the decentralization and the delegation of authority which I announced some time after that, applications from the small- and medium-sized business communities in the Atlantic provinces have been coming in at approximately twice the previous rate and have been approved at approximately twice the previous rate. As of now—in fact, as of some time ago—under those existing programs applications for up to $250,000 can be handled by an officer in a provincial office without further reference to interdepartmental committees and the whole bureaucratic rigamarole that was involved up to that time; so we have had quite a success story in simplifying and accelerating the activities under the old programs.

As of February 15 we have very much broadened the scope of those programs. We have made it possible for a wider range of assistance to be available to a much wider range of business and business-related activity. All of this is quite good news for the private sector in the Atlantic provinces and has been welcomed as such.

Senator MacEachen: Well, it is surprising that the premiers are so unhappy that, despite the success story, they are seeking a meeting with the Prime Minister to discuss what they describe as the strangulation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The minister talks about a success story, but he has confirmed that from June 1987 until mid-February 1988 no new money was expended under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. If that is success, I leave it to the minister's choice of words—

Senator Frith:—to imagine what failure might be!

Senator MacEachen: Failure may be around the corner.

I note one point that the minister made—namely, that this new era was to remove bureaucratic structures, as it were, of various kinds and would permit the region around Moncton to make decisions. Now we find Premier Buchanan saying that Ottawa still has a stranglehold on decision-making and that it was obvious from the recent tour that the minister made that Ottawa was still dominant, because the minister had been accompanied in all of his visits to premiers by Mr. Dalton Camp. Those are the allegations of Premier Buchanan. I would like the minister to tell me why Premier Buchanan is so incapable of identifying success and finds it more like failure.

Senator Murray: To deal with the last remark first, while my honourable friend was in London I spent most of the parliamentary recess in the Atlantic provinces meeting with the four premiers, chiefly to discuss the renewal of the ERDA process. The majority of the ERDA subagreements in that region expire at the end of March 1989, and we wanted to get a head start on that process. As I have said, I met with each of the Atlantic premiers. In the case of Premier Buchanan, he emerged with me from a meeting that had lasted several hours to pronounce himself completely satisfied—completely satisfied—with the work of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I can only conclude, therefore, that the media reports on which the Leader of the Opposition is basing his comments are incomplete.

With regard to Mr. Dalton Camp, I do not think that he would accept, nor do any of us accept, the description of him as being an Ottawa person. He is a native of New Brunswick with wide experience in the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Frith: He just comes here to pick up his cheques!

Senator Murray: As senior adviser to the cabinet, he was and is one of the chief advocates of a new regional development policy, one that places the maximum amount of decision-making authority in the region. He and Professor Donald Savoie, of the University of Moncton, played a key role in the establishment of this agency. He attended all the ERDA meetings with me, because I asked that he be assigned to attend those meetings with me.

● (1430)

By the way, I do not get the impression that Premier Buchanan, or anybody else in that region, takes any objection to the presence of Mr. Camp at those meetings.

With regard to the question of new money, yes, as the Leader of the Opposition says, it is true that, of the $200 million allocated to the agency in the fiscal year that ends on March 31, none of it was spent between June and February. The honourable senator takes vigorous objection to this fact. Of course, that is his privilege; but I make no apologies whatever for the fact, and I believe there is a great deal of support in the region for the fact that it is much more important to do things right than to do them fast. I think we are all aware that in the past efforts to throw money around wildly have not really produced very much in terms of progress against the chronic problems of regional disparity that beset the Atlantic provinces.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would like to put the correct quotation on the record so that I will not be accused of taking exception to the presence of Dalton Camp. The minister is free to secure help wherever he wishes, even from a political adviser. The quotation reads:

—the presence of political adviser Dalton Camp during recent meetings Mr. Murray and Mr. McPhail held with each of the Maritime premiers suggested that Ottawa is calling the shots, Mr. Buchanan said.

That comment is to be linked with his earlier comments to the effect that the region was not involved in major decisions, and the presence of Mr. Camp was evidence to him that the political commissariat in Ottawa was calling the shots rather than Mr. McPhail in Moncton. Mr. Buchanan said all that, not I.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the quotation that has been placed on the record by the Leader of the Opposition. In response I would say, first, that there has been unprecedented consultation from the beginning with the provinces on matters affecting the agency. Indeed, the advisory board to the agency that is now in place was appointed by me, after consultation with each of the premiers, and, in the case of three of the provinces, senior provincial public servants are members of the board. So the premiers and the governments of the Atlantic provinces are well plugged in to what is happening in the agency.

Second, with regard to the contention that Ottawa is calling the shots, there is no question but that we are dealing with an agency of the government that has a minister and a deputy minister—

Senator MacEachen: And a political adviser.

Senator Murray:—both of whom must be accountable to Parliament for the activities of the agency. We considered and rejected the option of setting up ACOA as an arms-length crown corporation with a decision-making board of directors, such as is the case with Air Canada or Canadian National. The feeling was that what might be gained by the region in autonomy would be lost in terms of presence at the cabinet table and in the system. Therefore, we hit upon the solution contained in the legislation that my honourable friends will be considering in due course, the ACOA legislation, which is to have an agency with unprecedented authority, autonomy and resources while still maintaining the accountability of the minister to Parliament. We believe we obtained the best of several possible worlds, but that is a matter my friends can consider when the legislation comes before the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING

IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, on February 10 last I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question regarding the International Whaling Commission and its moratorium on whaling. Since I asked that question, which relates to Canada's support for measures taken by the United States against Japan if Japan undertook a breach of that moratorium, it has been announced that the U.S. Commerce Secretary, Mr. William Verity, has made a finding under U.S. domestic law that Japan has indeed launched an expedition to take 300 whales, and that this is in violation of the commercial whaling moratorium of the International Whaling Commission. The result of Mr. Verity's finding, as reported in the press, is that the U.S. will take sanctions against Japan and withdraw Japanese fishing rights in U.S. waters. In addition, under U.S. law, President Reagan has 60 days to decide whether he wishes to take any further retaliation against Japan.

Honourable senators, I would like to renew the question. Was Canada consulted by the United States in terms of making this finding and taking these measures, and does Canada intend to support these sanctions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators I shall have to make inquiries.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS—REACTION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last year, during the Francophone Commonwealth Conference, questions were raised here and elsewhere about the government's representations to the officials of Senegal with respect to the lack of democratic practices in that country. Last Sunday a presidential election was held there, and it appears that the leading candidate for the opposition, the head of the Democratic Party, Maître Wade, has either been detained or imprisoned—at least, his whereabouts is not generally known. Earlier Maître Wade had attended a meeting in Ottawa at which he raised his concerns about the democratic practices of the government of his country.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate, through the government, make representations to the Francophone Commonwealth about the safety and security of Maître Wade? Will the government make direct representations to the Government of Senegal to ensure that Maître Wade's security and wellbeing are protected, and, at the same time, inform us whether or not representatives of the government attended that election held last Sunday as observers to ensure that the western nations are informed of any undemocratic practices that might affect the due process in Senegal during the election?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall consult with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to see what information can be brought forward on the subject.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a supplementary question on the same issue. I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate will know that the presidents of the three international bodies, the one to which his party belongs and the one to which my party belongs, asked the current President of Senegal, Mr. Diouf, if external observers could be sent to that election to ensure that democratic voting practices were followed, to which Mr. Diouf replied that he would not tolerate outside observers. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in addition to consulting with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would consult with the president of his party to see what the party's reaction is through their international connections.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall cast a wide net so far as information is concerned. I must do so with the caveat that the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada is not part of my ministerial responsibilities.

Senator Frith: No loans for you!

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell moved the second reading of Bill S-15, to amend the Patent Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the second reading of Bill S-15, which is a very short bill, I should like to say that I thought it would be worthwhile to bring this bill before the Senate after I read a recent article in the Globe and Mail entitled: "Drug firms increase prices faster than inflation rate". Honourable senators, according to that story by Linda McQuaig:

The prices of more than a thousand pharmaceutical drugs have risen faster than the consumer price index in the past six months. Many of these are brand-name drugs, whose manufacturers have given assurances that increases will not exceed the CPI.

Lawrence Archer, a spokesman for the Ontario Health Ministry, said yesterday that 1,099 drugs are more than 5 per cent costlier on this month's price list than they were last July, while the CPI rose by 4.4 per cent. This number makes up almost half the total provincial formulary.

In a few cases, drug prices rose by more than 100 per cent, and in one case the increase was 250 per cent, Mr. Archer said. He would not release the name of the drugs in question . . .

The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, which represents the large multinational drug companies, pledged that drug price increases would not outstrip increases in the CPI when it lobbied successfully last fall for increased patent protection for brand-name drugs . . .

Jack Kay, chairman of the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, which represents the producers of low-cost generic drugs, said yesterday that some manufacturers are trying to get large price increases into place before the price review board comes into effect.

Any price rollbacks that the board orders will not be retroactive, said Roy Atkinson, executive director of the board.

Honourable senators, with that as a background, and because of the fact that I saw that the government was taking no action, I thought that I should do something to protect the consumers of this country. Therefore, I introduced Bill S-15.

The purpose of Bill S-15 is to amend the Patent Act in such a manner as to increase the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. It gives the board the power to deem prices to be excessive whenever they increase faster than the rate of inflation.

When the board determines that a drug is being sold at an excessive price, because the increase has exceeded the rate of inflation, it shall do one of two things: (1) remove market exclusivity from that drug and one other medicine of the patentee; or (2) order the patentee to reduce the price at which it is selling the drug to a price consistent with the increase in the rate of inflation.

Where the board determines that a medicine has been sold for a period of at least 12 months at a price that is excessive, because the increase has exceeded the increase in the cost of living, the board has three options at its disposal. It must: (1) remove market exclusivity from either or both of the drugs in question and one other patented medicine; (2) order that the price of the drug be reduced to a level consistent with the increase in the cost of living; or (3) limit future price increases to an amount that takes into account the overcharge for the 12-month period after the price was set.

Options (2) and (3) are available to the board if it decides not to use option (1). The third option is an attempt to retrieve some of the extra charges for future consumers of the drug.

If, for example, a patentee could increase his price by 6 per cent for a full year when the appropriate rate of inflation was only 5 per cent, a future price increase would be limited for a one-year period to the lesser of the increase in CPI less 1 per cent or the increase that the board would normally allow less 1 per cent.

Although this provision does nothing to assist individual drug purchasers to recoup any overcharges unless they consume a drug over a long period of time, it does enable provincial pharmacare programs and subscribers to private drug insurance programs to recoup any overpayments made in the past. This should act as a strong deterrent to drug companies against raising prices beyond CPI increases.

The board, therefore, must compute the difference between the increase in the price of a patented medicine and the increase in the cost of living on an annual basis for every drug. Any drug which was sold in Canada on June 27, 1986, shall have its price judged according to changes in the cost of living in June of every year. Any annual price increase that exceeds the rate of inflation shall be deemed excessive, even if it took place before the board was established. Any drug that was first sold in Canada after June 27, 1986, shall have its prices judged according to changes in the cost of living on the anniversary of the introduction of the drug into Canada. That is, a drug introduced in February 1987 will have its prices examined as of each February. Any increases over the rate of inflation shall be deemed to be excessive, even if they took place before the establishment of the board.

These two amendments require the board to examine every drug price on an annual basis and to take suitable action even when dealing with prices charged in the past. These amendments allow the board to look at prices as far back as June 1986, which is the effective date for many of the provisions of exclusivity of Bill C-22.

Most of the other amendments are consequential amendments and are made only to renumber sections in order to have those amendments included in the Patent Act.

Honourable senators, you might be of the opinion that the prices review board now has the power to use the CPI as a guide and will so use it. However, the factors which the board may take into consideration under the present Patent Act when determining whether or not the price of medicine is excessive are cited in subsection 41.15(5). They are as follows: (a) the price at which the patentee sold the medicine during the preceding five years; (b) the price of other medicines in the same therapeutic class during the preceding five years; (c) the price of other medicines in the same therapeutic class in other countries during the preceding five years; (d) the consumer price index. Those are the factors the board "may" take into consideration. Under my amendments, the board "shall" take into consideration the consumer price index.

Under the present act, if the board cannot make a decision on the basis of the above four factors, it may also look at the cost of making and marketing the medicine.

Honourable senators, some people may think that there is no need for this amendment. They may think that the board will be set up some time in March or April and that it will begin to look at the prices of different drugs. I have a price increase study that was completed by several pharmacists in this country. That study indicates that many drugs have substantially increased in price.

Let me give you some examples of increases: A drug called Tagamet has gone up 9.9 per cent. A drug called Stelabid No. 1 has gone up 16.55 per cent. A drug called Dyazide has gone up 9.98 per cent.

The drug company Merrell Dow has raised some its drug prices by as much as 50 per cent.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: The majority of that company's products were increased by more than 16 per cent.

The drug company Janssen has a very small list of products, none of which appears to have generic competition. Their price increases ranged from a low of 7.69 per cent to a high of 22.08 per cent in the last year. Let me give you some examples of that company's drug increases: Hismanal, 10 milligram tablets, has increased by 17.36 per cent; Innovar, 0.05 milligram per millilitre, has increased by 22.08 per cent.

A drug company called Sandoz markets a large number of products in Canada and faces very little, if any, generic competition. Their price increases ranged from a low of 15.73 per cent to a high of 35.93 per cent in one year once Bill C-22 was passed. Let me give you some examples of that company's drug increases: Calcium Sandoz syrup, which is a calcium product, has increased 33.49 per cent; Colchicine, which is a drug used for gout, has increased 35.33 per cent; Fiorinal capsules, which is used for headaches, has increased 22.1 per cent; and Mellaril, a tranquilizer, has increased 15.74 per cent.

Honourable senators, all those drug companies that raised their drug prices after the bill was passed had promised they would not raise those prices above the CPI. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs told us in the House of Commons that drug prices would not go up one cent.

[Senator Bonnell]

However, there is one drug company, Merck Frosst, that was able to keep its pledge. In fact, it has had some reductions in its prices. If one company can do that, what has happened to all the other companies belonging to this great association that gave us this pledge? I have come to the conclusion that the association representing pharmaceutical drug companies is not a very cohesive organization and has no one who speaks for it. Therefore, a promise made by the president of the association means that only certain members of the association, such as Merck Frosst, are prepared to follow through with their pledge.

According to the study that I have, there is only one drug company that has followed through with the pledge. I believe it is necessary to ensure that the consumers of this country are protected and that the price review board is given some teeth. In June of 1986 the companies got their request for ten years' exclusivity; therefore, that should be the date from which the basic prices are set.

Those companies that increased their prices by 33 per cent or 35 per cent should be made to roll back. If they do not want to roll back, then they should lose their patent rights on those drugs. That would enable Canadian generic companies to expand and enable Canadian consumers to receive those drugs at a reasonable cost. We should not put this bill on the backs of the sick, the infirm, the aged, the crippled, the unemployed, the poor, the widows or the one-parent families of this country.

If enough pressure is put on the minister, he may do one of two things. He may stand up in the House of Commons and say that he cannot support the consumers any further, resign from his post and then be a supporter of the corporate people, or he may realize that, as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, he has to support the consumers and resign from the post of Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In a situation such as this he cannot support both groups. He either has to support the pharmaceutical drug companies, which are multinational companies based 85 per cent in the United States and 15 per cent in Europe and Japan, or he has to support the consumers.

Many millions of dollars are being taken out of our economy by these multinational companies, and that means that jobs are being lost in this country. There is also the fact that the Blue Cross premiums are increasing by 18 per cent; insurance plans are increasing by 18 to 20 per cent; provincial and federal taxes are increasing in order that the government can meet the costs of drug plans, hospitals, senior citizens and veterans who receive medication through the veterans' program. In order for the Government of Canada to pay a big price for those drugs, the taxes of Canadians have to go up. Where does that money go? It goes to the multinationals abroad. Our consumers lose and our labour force loses, because they lose jobs. Those people in the labour force who are negotiating contracts find that instead of getting another few cents per hour for their labours, they now have to pay more for their health care package because of the increase in drug costs. In order to get a health care package, they get a smaller raise.

This affects all groups of Canadians. This is a serious problem. I am not asking that Bill C-22 be rescinded. I am asking only that the price review board be given some authority to roll these prices back to the cost of living. The minister said that they would not go up one cent, but you can see what has happened. Bill C-22 has been law for one and one-half months, and look at what has happened.

Senator Frith: The companies said the same thing.

Senator Bonnell: The companies said that they would stay within the CPI, but, according to the price increase study, Merck Frosst is the only company that has done that. I would like to congratulate that company.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, these are not just my thoughts I am giving you. I have the minister's statement before me. He said that Bill C-22 was good for all Canadians. Now you see just how good it is!—with drug prices on one drug going up by 35 per cent and on another by 150 per cent—and in one month.

The minister further stated that Bill C-22 would not cause the prices of drugs to rise, but that it was possible that the prices of certain drugs might not come down as quickly under the current legislation. "Might not come down as quickly" is what the minister said. Imagine! "Might not come down!"

Senator Petten: Nor did they.

Senator Bonnell: We will also find that PMAC said that consumers would be fully protected through the review board. I contend that they are not fully protected through the review board, because the Leader of the Government in the Senate has admitted that the review board is not set up yet and will not be set up until some time in March or April. The executive director, Roy Atkinson, said that even when it is set up it will not be able to do anything about those prices that have already been raised. The witnesses from the generic drug companies said that the drug companies are jumping in ahead and raising the prices quickly before the review board could be set up. Even if they are set up, they only "may" use the CPI, they do not "have to" use the CPI. That is only one of the criteria. I say that they should have to use the CPI and we should make them use the CPI.

The United Church of Canada has stated that the potential employment promised by the pharmaceutical sector is outweighed by the financial burden that will be created by increased drug prices. The United Church of Canada has been concerned all along about the prices of drugs going up.

The Royal Canadian Legion said that drug prices would definitely increase if this drug bill passed. The Royal Canadian Legion was also right. It predicted exactly what has happened.

The Coalition of the Provinces for the Handicapped said that the Drug Prices Review Board might have no real effect on drug prices. I contend that that is true. They have no real effect, because they only "may" use those things, they do not "have to" use those criteria, and they cannot roll back the price of drugs, which has gone up already as high as 150 per cent on certain drugs.

The Consumers of Saskatchewan said that the bill would delay the introduction of low-cost generic products, leading to a rise in the cost of drugs. Again, the consumers were right; that is exactly what happened.

The registered nurses said that Bill C-22 would cause drug prices to rise. Well, the registered nurses were right as well.

The Ontario Health Association said that Bill C-22 would add significantly to hospital drug costs by delaying the effect of competitive pricing. They were right as well.

Health care services will suffer to compensate for the increase in the cost of drugs, according to the Canadian Nurses Association. Well, that is bound to happen. If provincial budgets are to be used up buying more expensive drugs, then something has to suffer. Hospital beds will have to be closed and hospital services or other medical care services will have to be cut back.

Honourable senators, I leave the bill with you and I ask for your support. Perhaps, if we send it to the House of Commons, they will accept it and give power to the Drug Prices Review Board.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: For clarification, will the honourable senator please answer a couple of questions?

Senator Bonnell: I will try.

Senator Barootes: Could you help us on this side, and myself in particular, by clarifying some of the figures you have given us? You spoke of the prices of drugs rising. I am not quite clear in my mind, Senator Bonnell, whether you were referring to manufacturers' prices, distributors' prices or retail prices. That is the first point.

Second, when you referred to the Globe and Mail article and someone from the Department of Health, were you referring to Canadian prices or Ontario prices? I want to point out that, contrary to the opinion of some people in this area, Canada does not stop at the borders of Ontario.

Finally, the third question that you might help me with, Senator Bonnell, is this: In the druggist survey that you mentioned, could you please tell us who conducted the survey and whether it was based on his retail prices or the prices he is paying to his distributor so that we can look into some of those statistics and inform ourselves about them?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as to the question about the Globe and Mail article, I cannot give an exact answer as to where they got their figures other than to repeat what Lawrence Archer, spokesman for the Ontario Health Industry, said. It does not state in the press release what prices he was using. However, I can tell you the prices I was using.

Senator Barootes: In other words, you do not know the level of prices.

Senator Bonnell: I do not know what level of prices Lawrence Archer of the Ontario Health Ministry was quoting. I was using a study of the impact of the drug price increases for January of 1988 carried out and compared by Andrew S.

Musial, B.Sc., Phm., and Jerry K. Taciuk, B.Sc., Phm. They compared the figures and the prices on the manufacturer's level from January 1, 1987, to January 1, 1988. They prepared a long list, and I just took a few examples. I could give you a long list of drugs. For example, I quoted a drug manufactured by Smith, Klein & French, Stelabid No. 1 tablets, 100 tablets size. The price in January 1987 was $31.11 and in 1988 was $36.26, an increase of 16.55 per cent; Stelabid No. 2 went up 16.59 per cent; and Stelabid Ultra tablets went up 16.60 per cent.

Senator Barootes: All in lots of 100s?

Senator Bonnell: Those were all in lots of 100s. I can give you different lots if you so wish. I can give you Tagamet, whether you want it 200, 300, 400 or 600 milligrams, but in each case they have gone up from 10 to 16 per cent or so. In fact, I would be pleased to give you a photostatic copy of my records so that you can have these figures, which show, for example, Merrell Dow's alertronic, a nice tonic which has a good quantity of alcohol in it. A 500 millilitre bottle on January 1, 1987, cost only $14.25; but on January 1, 1988, it cost $17.25. It has gone up 21.05 per cent. The 250-millilitre bottle cost $58.95 on January 7 and went up to $71.35 on January 1, 1988, an increase of 21.03 per cent.

That is what I am talking about. Drug after drug after drug has gone up, as represented by those figures. For example, Tace is a drug used in the treatment of carcinoma of the prostate; in January 1987 the price for 60 12-milligram capsules was $24.40 and in January 1988 that price had increased to $36.60. That is a 50 per cent increase in one year.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, I could go on and on, but I do not want to hold up the Senate, because I know you all have other things to do.

On motion of Senator David, debate adjourned.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 10, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the urgency of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act in order to remove the restriction that requires a Canadian veteran who served overseas in World War II and who chose to take up residence outside Canada to return to Canada for 365 days in order to become eligible to receive the allowances payable under the Act and other benefits available thereunder.

He said: Honourable senators, many years ago one of Canada's Prime Ministers reportedly uttered these words as a pause for thought: "There is not only a right thing to do, but—there is a right time to do it." This pause for thought, which I noted the other day, struck me as I pondered the justification for Parliament to treat with the utmost urgency my inquiry, which asks that an amendment be introduced to the War Veterans Allowance Act to remove the restriction that requires that a Canadian veteran who served in a theatre of war in War World I or World War II and who chose to take up residence outside Canada return to Canada for 365 days in order to become eligible to receive the allowances payable under the act and any other benefits available.

Honourable senators, this change in the veterans legislation, which I seek through my inquiry, is "the right thing to do," and right now is "the right time to do it!" As a matter of fact, it is long past the right time to do it. It must be glaringly obvious to all that there is not much time left, when one considers the average age of our veterans. The average age of those who served in World War II is 67 to 68; the average age of those who served in World War I is 88; and even the average age of Korean veterans is close to 58.

To put the subject of my inquiry into perspective, let me put on the record what the War Veterans Allowance Act states. The act provides for the payment of a monthly allowance to veterans and their dependants who meet service eligibility requirements and who, because of age or incapacity, are unable to work and have insufficient income for maintenance as determined by an income test. The monthly allowances now are as follows: The married rate is $1,127.46; the single rate is $773.67. A couple may earn casual earnings up to a total of $4,200 a year or $350 a month. A single person may earn casual earnings of up to $2,700 a year or $225 per month.

There are five service requirements, and, without listing all of them, the one we are most concerned with is that veterans of Canadian forces are eligible if they served in a theatre of war—and this applies to both World War I and World War II—or served in both wars and were honourably discharged from the last enlistment, or served in the United Kingdom during World War I. It says nothing about where they should live after the war, the subject of my inquiry.

It is worthwhile to note that service in a theatre of war during World War II—and this was changed to be more lenient—includes service while on duty beyond the three-mile territorial limit surrounding the continents of North and South America and the islands adjacent thereto, including Newfoundland, Bermuda and the West Indies. So we have broadened the base of eligibility in recent years.

It is also worth noting that Commonwealth or allied forces who were living in Canada at the time of joining the forces or who have lived in Canada for a total of ten years are eligible for War Veterans Allowance. I am referring to allied prisoners who fought with the allied forces. They are eligible for War Veterans Allowance, but our Canadians overseas are not eligible as long as they stay in the U.K. This highlights the ridiculous situation that exists, in that we cannot get a reciprocal agreement with our mother country for whom, and along with whom, we fought.

Even under the civilian requirements for eligibility under our War Pensions and Civilian Allowances Act, non-Canadians who served in Canadian merchant ships during both wars are eligible, along with members of the voluntary aid detachment of the British Red Cross, Canadian Firefighters, welfare workers, nursing aids, ambulance or transport drivers, staff of overseas headquarters, nurses who served under the Canadian Red Cross or the St. John Ambulance Brigade, and members of the Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit of World War II.

Honourable senators, the pertinent section of the War Veterans Allowance Act is explained in a letter from the minister to Mr. Donald M. Smith, the Agent General of the Province of Nova Scotia, dated November 22, 1984—that is almost four years ago—in which he stated:

Prior to 1960, the residency requirements of the War Veterans Allowance Act made it mandatory that Canadian veterans, who chose to remain in a foreign country, did so as a matter of choice and, as part of that choice, accepted the social security system, as it existed, in their new country. In 1960 the requirement was relaxed to the extent that the "one year clause" was introduced to make it possible for Canadian veterans, who had been living abroad, and who decided to return to Canada, to be eligible for War Veterans Allowance without too long a wait.

That was fine in 1960, but this is 28 years later and it certainly does not apply now—or certainly shouldn't apply now.

Mr. Donald Smith, the Agent General for the Province of Nova Scotia, is one of the leaders of the thrust to try to encourage us to recognize the few veterans who are left and who are not qualified for War Veterans Allowance. In a further letter to Mr. Smith the minister stated:

Having said the above you can rest assured that both I and the officials in my Department are giving serious consideration to relaxing this requirement even further, and will be doing so, if it is at all possible bearing in mind the current economic climate.

Then, a few days later, on December 10, 1984, the minister wrote again to Mr. Donald Smith and said the following:

In 1960, it had become evident that some veterans had strong reasons for wanting to leave Canada, e.g., to a warmer climate for health reasons. The one-year clause was introduced to protect such veterans and, in addition, specifically to ensure that only bona fide residents of Canada who went abroad would be allowed to receive War Veterans Allowance. . . .

It is pertinent to this discussion that veterans who are long-term residents of other countries are eligible for and receive all the social benefits payable to other residents of the countries in which they have chosen to reside.

I cannot see why that is pertinent, when we take into consideration the social benefits in the U.K. which some of these veterans are receiving. They are nothing to brag about. That's for sure!

● (1530)

It is significant that other countries do not pay war veterans allowance or an equivalent benefit to their veterans who choose to reside in another country. It is a shame that the United Kingdom will not enter into a reciprocal agreement with Canada, because, as I mentioned before, we pay an allowance to allied veterans, many of whom are from England. After ten years' residence they can pick up their war veterans allowances and go back home if they so choose.

Honourable senators, I have raised this anomaly in the veterans legislation, the subject of my inquiry, for some years now both in the other place, when I served as veterans affairs critic in the years 1968 to 1978, and here in the Senate since that time. Evidently I have not brought it up often enough, and it is obvious that nobody is listening. I can tell senators, however, that I am reminded of it very often, and I have the files to prove it. Other parliamentarians, many of whom sit in this chamber, are reminded of it constantly. This matter is still brought to my attention by concerned citizens in the U.K., some of whom are veterans themselves who are not in need of government assistance but support those Canadian veterans and their spouses who cannot manage to live a decent existence because of this outmoded and outdated restriction. Strangely enough, the plea persistently comes from England, our mother country, for whom, and along with whom, we fought in two wars, even though many Canadian veterans who fall into this category chose to take up residence in other countries.

Honourable senators, I could mention a gentleman by the name of Percy Towgood, who is now retired and who was our welfare officer in Macdonald House in England. I could mention Percy Mercer, who is now the National Secretary of the Canadian-U.K. Association of Veterans. I have already mentioned Don Smith, the Agent General for Nova Scotia, and there is a lady by the name of Mrs. G.N. Sellers of the Canadian Women's Club, to whom are referred from the department some of the most deserving cases.

Honourable senators, I have a list of the number of veterans who are recipients of disability pensions and war veterans allowances or civilian war allowances living outside Canada, together with a list of the countries in which they live. The number of veterans is the cause of contention and controversy. These are the totals as of April 11, 1984, and they were given to me by the Honourable Bennett Campbell, who was then the Minister of Veterans Affairs. These numbers were taken from the answers I received to a question I placed on the order paper at that time, and I ask honourable senators to keep in mind that they include the recipients both of disability pensions and of war veterans allowances: United States, 6,423; United Kingdom, 1,891; Australia and New Zealand, 103; South Africa, 40; Europe, 110; and other countries, 127, for a total of 8,694. Unfortunately, I did not ask for a breakdown of both categories, but I presume that the numbers have decreased considerably in the past four years.

At the same time I asked for and received an answer to another question as to the number of applications received by DVA during the previous year, which would take us back to 1983. I asked, first, how many were willing and able to return to Canada to fulfil the 365 day residency requirement, and, second, how many had had to refuse to return to Canada as a result of illness. The number of applications received was as follows, broken down by country: United States, 82; United Kingdom, 265; northwest Europe, 4; central Europe, 5; eastern Europe, 1; southern Europe, 41; others in Europe, 2; South Africa, 6; Australia, 4; New Zealand, 4; Mexico, 4; the West Indies, 2; Central America, 1; South America, 1; India and Pakistan, 1, for a total of 423. Of those 423, honourable senators, only 13 were willing or able to return to Canada to fulfil the residency requirements, and two cited health as their reason for not returning to Canada.

Looking at the statistics showing the number of veterans passing away each year, we guesstimate that 25,000 veterans are dying on a global basis, so these numbers that I refer to are reduced by 10 to 20 per cent.

Honourable senators, I received that information in 1984. I then received a letter dated April 22, 1985, from the Minister of Veterans Affairs in which he said, in part:

It has been estimated that the number of veterans living outside Canada is 27,523. The change requested—that is, the change to make veterans eligible for the war veterans allowance without returning to Canada, —would add approximately 4,400 new recipients to this program resulting in an annual cost of about $33 million.

Honourable senators, I doubt that very much.

I also received a letter from Don Ferguson, Assistant Deputy Minister, Pensions, Health and Social Programs, Veterans Affairs, Canada, dated January 5, 1987. He provided me with a whole page of a formula used to calculate the numbers, to the best of their knowledge, of veterans who would qualify. They estimate that number to be 4,046. Then, on September 30, 1986, I received a letter from Percy Mercer, the National Secretary of the Canadian Veterans' Association of the United Kingdom, which, in reference to the Canadian Veterans Association, stated:

When this Association was set up in 1948 there were about 20,000 Canadian veterans resident here. A very large number of these were WW1 men, most of whom have now passed on. Many of the WW2 men also have died and many have gone back to Canada. I would hazard a guess that there are not more than 3500 here now. But that number is not relevant to our case. All we are concerned with are the 450 or so veterans/widows who have not gone over to qualify and will not do so. The others that are here are either already in receipt of the War Veterans Allowance, or have war disability pensions, or works pensions etc, and these with the U.K. Social Security payments, put them outside the scope of the W.V.A. Act, and do not come into our reckoning. Our estimates were accepted by the DVA office at the High Commission here.

That, honourable senators, proves a few things. The number of veterans we are concerned with is not 4,400 and the cost will not be $33 million, as stated by the department.

Honourable senators, the last time I raised this issue in the Senate chamber was in November 1984 when I tabled the report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs entitled "They Served—We Care", and I referred to our recommendation No. 5, which states:

We recommend that the residence requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified persons to benefit from the legislation while residing outside Canada.

Just as I indicated at that time in 1984, so it is at this stage in time that most veterans find it difficult or, indeed, impossible to return to Canada to establish another residence in order to comply with the present legislation. Honourable senators, keep in mind that they would not apply for it at their age if they did not need it. Often these veterans are too poor, too old or too ill to be able to travel or to establish a new domicile in Canada for a year. I might also say that frequently they have families living in England, which also makes it financially and psychologically out of the question for them to return to Canada.

The question we must ask ourselves, honourable senators, is this: What are we proving by forcing the veterans to return to Canada at this late stage in their lives? We are simply creating more hardship for them, because the veterans, if entitled to the allowance, receive it almost immediately upon their return to Canada, if they are well enough to return, and continue to receive it while fulfilling the requirement to remain in Canada for a year.

So the veteran is faced with the added expense of living accommodation, food and other daily needs in two countries and is denied the companionship of his or her spouse, to no one's benefit but only to the inconvenience of the veteran.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, we should remember that the veteran is entitled to a pension or allowance as a right, because he served in a theatre of war in a far-off country when service was required. He is entitled to a pension or an allowance for that service and yet he was not awarded a pension or allowance, because he might not have planned to live in Canada when the war was over. I should also point out that when that Canadian veteran offered his service and the governments of the day told him what a wonderful citizen he was, nobody told him that if he lived after the war and expected to receive benefits for service, then he better be sure to come back to Canada or he wouldn't be deserving.

Honourable senators will probably get sick of hearing this from me, but many times I have read Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden's pledge to Canadians in 1917 at Vimy Ridge. He said:

No man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken faith with the men who won and the men who died.

I cannot, however, find where he said to the veterans, when he made that pledge, that there was a condition to their service and that, in order for Canada to show how grateful it was, they had to make sure that they returned to Canada to live.

Honourable senators, to continue, this is what the Canadian Legion has said to Parliament on a number of occasions about this anomaly in the act, as reflected in my inquiry, and I quote:

We, the Legion, have asked on many an occasion for removal of the residence requirements for Canadians living outside Canada. However, no legislation has ever taken place on these appeals.

Many veterans without Canadian military service have, since 1960, been able to draw the War Veterans Allowance in Canada and then return to their homeland or other countries and continue to receive the allowance. On the other hand, Canadian veterans—many of whom had lengthy and good service overseas—who took their discharge and remained in the U.K. are in a less favourable position. It is necessary for them to return to Canada, remain for at least one full year and be in receipt of the allowance before proceeding back to the U.K. Because of costs, illness, age and other commitments, few are financially able to do this.

Many widows of Canadian veterans are in a similar position. They have spent their entire lives outside Canada. They never came back and they have not seen Canada since. They know of no one in this country with whom they could live for the compulsory period, so it is not feasible for them to plan to come here in order to meet the requirements.

It is only fair to extend the legislation to provide eligibility for these Canadian servicemen and their widows without forcing them to come back to Canada for one year. This prerequisite really accomplishes nothing, except to incur expenses and create hardships for those involved. If the allowance can be paid to non-Canadians after a ten-year residency in Canada and be continued for life after departure, surely our own veterans living outside Canada should receive the same benefits without being compelled to return.

Honourable senators, on one of my visits overseas, as part of a government delegation to commemorate Canada's participation in battlefields of Europe, I was struck by an article in a London newspaper headed, "For many Commonwealth veterans old age is more of a fight than World War II." The article went on to say, in reference to these veterans:

They survived the bullets and the bombs. Now they face an equally frightening prospect—growing old! Their fight for freedom has now become a struggle against illness and infirmity.

Injuries received during the war have left many veterans disabled in later life. Many live in poor countries, which lack even the basic facilities for their care. The British Commonwealth Ex-Service League desperately needs money to provide assistance where it is most urgently required—hospital treatment, shelter homes, subsistence grants for widows, and even wheelchairs. The advertisement went on to say:

We do everything we can, but we can do so much more with your help.

Please don't leave them to fight alone.

This advertisement was placed in the newspaper by the Prince Philip Appeal for Commonwealth Veterans. I have quoted this advertisement in many of my speeches to veterans across Canada, and pointed out that, thank God, we in Canada do not have to appeal for funds for destitute veterans, because we care and our government cares. Our veterans associations across this nation are devoted to helping our income-stressed veterans through poppy funds and in cooperation with governments who provide for emergencies, and our government provides disability pensions, War Veterans Allowance, treatment benefits, dental care, funeral and burial assistance through the Last Post Fund, along with a range of services which are the envy of the world. We provide ambulatory care, home adaptations, transportation, adult residential care, nursing home care, educational assistance, child care and even attendance allowance.

We have here in Canada our own Prince Philip Appeal Fund, which has a target for this year of $1 million to provide aid to Commonwealth veterans who live in the third world. I should mention here that Senator Derek Lewis serves on the committee sparked by the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion to raise those funds for the Prince Philip Appeal. There are other organizations prominent in Canada that care. I refer to the army, navy and air force, the Royal Commonwealth Society, the Monarchist League of Canada, the Council of Honourary Colonels of Canada, the National Citizens Coalition, to name a few. Yet, we leave a few thousand, maybe even fewer, veterans penalized by our restriction. While we have amended our legislation time and again to overcome anomalies in the act—in my 20 years here we have probably done so as many times—we stubbornly refuse to appeal the inhumane section in that act—an act we are so proud of—that denies a few Canadians a little comfort for the few years they have left. I refer to those veterans.

Let me say without hesitation that the government recently increased the fund known as Assistance to Needy Veterans Overseas from $60,000 to $100,000 per year. This fund provides each of the designated veterans or their dependants with the sum of £16 per month, £4 per week. In another gesture our government sent last Christmas gifts of £25 each to 264 needy veterans in England. However, I had no reason to rejoice about such contributions when I received from Percy Mercer, in August 1987, a list of 40-odd destitute Canadian veterans in the U.K. Percy Mercer is a Newfoundlander who is National Secretary of the Canadian Veterans Association of the United Kingdom, and he fights for these destitute veterans. I understand from the letterhead that the honorary president of this association is the High Commissioner for Canada. Let me relate the circumstances of two people on this list. One veteran is named Richard William Nelson. He is 95 years of age and is a widower. He receives £45 per week, which amounts to a little over $100 per week. This includes the assistance from the Needy Canadian Veterans Overseas Fund. He relies upon relatives and neighbours and home help two and a half hours per week to keep going in his home. This veteran reports that all his living costs have to be carefully considered. He has nothing for anything other than necessities. It is understandable that his standard of living is very low and has been so for many years. So nobody can tell me that these veterans should be satisfied with the social systems of other countries.

• (1540)

The other individual is the widow of Captain John Millington, who received the Military Cross, Alice Edith Millington. Her total weekly income is also £47. Her income includes assistance from the Needy Canadian Veterans Overseas Fund, supplementary allowances, and she lives rent free. Mrs Millington is now very deaf and is only partially sighted. She is confined to her home and depends on her elderly son and occasional home help. She has been a widow for 66 years. Her husband had a distinguished war record in the Alberta Regiment. He was wounded in France on September 15, 1916, and was awarded the Military Cross on November 15, 1916. It seems that he received no compensation for his service.

Certainly Captain Millington must have been eligible for a disability pension. According to the information I have, he served with the Alberta Regiment. I wonder whether we should go to the premier of that province and ask him to take some money out of the Heritage Fund in order to help this poor lady.

The other organization from which I hear is the Canadian Women's Club, the chairman of which is Mrs. G.N. Sellers. They also look after needy veterans. In her letter she says, in part:

As Chairman of the Service Committee of the Canadian Women's Club I am concerned with the welfare of Canadian veterans living in the UK. When I spoke to you I put in a plea for these veterans who are not eligible for the Canadian Veterans Allowance.

Mrs. Sellers goes on to say:

Cases are referred to the Canadian Women's Club by the Department of Veterans' Affairs . . .

It should be the other way round. She goes on to say that they have 71 names on their list of people who are destitute. She states further:

You asked me to send you details of our 6 most needy cases so that they could be brought to the attention of the members of your Committee.

Here are just two cases from her list. First of all, a Miss Margaret E. Nuttall, who is a World War II veteran of the CWAC, which is the Canadian Women's Army Corps. Her situation is as follows:

Lives alone. Has had a long line of illness over the years. Now heading for another breakdown. Serious cancer patient. Attempting to follow therapy and diet to combat the cancer, but this is expensive. Has many financial difficulties.

The other Canadian on this list is a World War II veteran, Thomas E. Smith. His situation is as follows:

[Senator Marshall]

Increasing financial difficulties. Suffers from spondylitis, ulcers, heart trouble, emphysema, and an inoperable hernia. Recently seriously ill. Can barely walk. Needs inhaler constantly with him. An ailing daughter. His wife trying to cope on her own.

Honourable senators, I am nearing the end. I want to refer to another organization known as the Newfoundlanders (Overseas) Association. The chairman of that organization wrote me in 1978, saying:

I would like to stress the importance I place upon the special plea that we make for those who, for various reasons, are unable to go and spend a year in Canada. Some are very ill indeed, and are forbidden by their doctors to travel. We have several widows, and one wife who has been deserted by her husband . . . She has failing eyesight and finds it extremely difficult to manage.

He mentioned another veteran living in Macclesfield, Cheshire, of whom he said:

He has scarcely worked since he left the Royal Navy in 1946, due to nervous depression, but his wife Dorothy has worked as a cook in a local hospital and managed to look after Roy and rear two sons as well. This gallant lady has now reached the age of sixty—

That means she is now 70.

—and therefore had to relinquish her job on 30th June.

Evidently, she qualified for the British Retirement Pension, which is approximately £38. Big deal!

In his letter the chairman of that organization went on further to say that this lady had planned to take her husband to Newfoundland for the year's residence, but recently received a letter from the people with whom she planned to reside in Newfoundland saying that they would be unable to accommodate her owing to problems of their own. He then went on to state:

These are the sort of people for whom I beg the Government of Canada to make a special concession.

Honourable senators, as late as January 5, 1988, this is what the deputy minister said to Percy Mercer:

At present, there are no changes contemplated to the legislation governing the payment of War Veterans Allowance outside Canada. However, I trust that the enhancements to the Assistance to Needy Canadian Veterans Overseas program will provide some immediate financial assistance to those Canadian veterans in the U.K. who are most in need. You may also rest assured that we shall continue to do whatever we can to ensure that our veterans in the U.K. receive the fairest and most equitable treatment possible.

That, honourable senators, is £4 per week.

Honourable senators, how do we resolve this problem? There are two ways. The first is that someone should go to Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and tell her that we served them well, and that if we can give the allied veterans and the U.K. veterans who came over here entitlement to War Veterans Allowance, which is now a good sum, and also free drugs, and allow them to work a bit for casual earnings, why can we not have a reciprocal agreement? The only answer I get from the Department of Veterans Affairs is that the matter is still in the formative stage. I think someone is trying to do something, but in a few years it will be too late.

Honourable senators, everyone I have spoken to here in Canada and in Parliament with respect to this matter agrees that the restrictions should be removed. However, no one seems to want to act. We brag about our veterans legislation, and rightly so. But, for the love of God, let us remove that blemish in our legislation and treat all veterans alike, not only those special veterans we brag about but those for whom we don't seem to care.

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on this matter today. However, I do wish to adjourn the debate. I want to say at this time that I congratulate Senator Marshall, who always has a good word to say on behalf of veterans, for the way in which he works to support them. I am sorry that he was not present in the Senate on December 15 of last year when I raised that very matter at the time Bill C-100 came before the Senate and was dealt with in one day. When I speak to this matter in the next few days, I shall say a few words to support Senator Marshall's cause.

Senator Marshall: I have spoken to Mr. Mercer and he intends to come to Canada in order to appear before our committee.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.
The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

DELIVERY SYSTEM FOR PROGRAM

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate one or two questions about the administration of the so-called western economic diversification program. The reason I ask about it now is that in the other place yesterday an explanation was given by the minister directly responsible, which I have read carefully. There is also the comment of the Minister of Transport, who is reported to have said yesterday outside the other house:

One of the issues, of course, about program delivery, is who gets the credit for it.

That is a direct quotation of the Minister of Transport, who apparently speaks for the government on this program in the other house.

What I would like to try to ascertain from the minister, if he can help me, is whether or not the government intends to set up a system and structure capable of delivering the programs for the $1.1 billion or $1.2 billion, both in the Atlantic development initiative and the western diversification initiative. We were led to believe that this would be a kind of cooperative arrangement with the provinces where the facilities are already in place, many of them having been put in place by the provinces. This is a matter that many of the provincial premiers have already complained about, because they do not appear to be reaching agreements with the federal government to deliver these programs in their respective regions.

The first question I should like to ask is whether it is the intention of the federal government to set up another complete delivery system for these diversification programs.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we will do what is necessary in that regard.

Let me say first of all that so far as the Western Economic Diversification Agency is concerned, I must confess that I have not read the remarks of Mr. McKnight to which the honourable senator referred. I will have to do that and perhaps consult him before replying on behalf of that agency.

So far as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is concerned, this question of credit—or visibility, as it is usually called—has been around for a good long time and successive federal governments have been properly concerned about whether the efforts of the federal taxpayer and the federal government in promoting the battle against regional disparity are properly acknowledged and recognized in the provinces concerned. I well remember discussions in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and elsewhere with the Honourable Pierre De Bané on this subject when he was Minister of DREE. In any case, as I say, the question of visibility has been with us for a long time and, of course, we are concerned about it.

So far as cooperative arrangements are concerned, I remind my honourable friend that there are and have been over the present five-year period about $1 billion in cooperative arrangements with the governments of the Atlantic provinces. This is the through ERDA sub-agreements.

The amount of duplication involved as between federal and provincial programs is really quite minimal, but in any case the $1 billion or so of new money that has been allocated to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency for the next five years is in addition to the ERDA agreements and is intended for direct assistance to the small- and medium-sized business community in the Atlantic provinces—direct assistance from the federal government through ACOA to that small- and medium-sized business community.

Let me say that so far as new delivery systems are concerned, as I stated yesterday, in the past six months we have been approving applications from small- and medium-sized businesses in the Atlantic provinces at twice the previous rate, and we have done so without any necessity to add to the personnel requirements in that region. We are confident that with the new authorities we have the structures and will have the staff to provide the direct assistance contemplated under these new programs.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is easy to double the rate. If you go from one to two, that is twice as much. It was down to such a low rate that there really was not much of a base to go on. In any event, I do not want to get into that argument.

Senator Murray: You do not want to get into it because I have the statistics right here and I can put them on the record.

Senator Olson: I want to make some inquiries so that I can find out where people who want to make use of this program should apply. Quite a number of people in western Canada would like to avail themselves of what is involved in this program. Do they make the application to some provincial department and the administrative officers that are already in place all over the provinces or will some new structure be set up?

This is very interesting, because one of the things Mr. McKnight said in the other place yesterday was that he would be remiss if he did not pay tribute to those who helped design this program. This program has a great deal of similarity to the federal coordinating offices that were set up in each of the provinces. I just happened to be the minister responsible for that, so I know about it. However, he did not give any credit to the people who went through that exercise.

Senator Murray: We will send you flowers next week.

Senator Olson: At page 13275 of House of Commons Debates he calls them the "federal economic development coordinators." I am glad they are using at least that base of experience.

Senator Murray: He is on a nostalgia kick.

Senator Olson: If I were on a nostalgia kick, I would take up some of the quotations I heard from Senator Murray, when I sat on that side of the house, about all of the waste and duplication that was going on. Now he is putting everything back in place without giving credit to the people who went before.

It is a serious question as to where people ought to apply. Will the officers be out in the field, and will Edmonton be the head office? Will there be a sub-office, or something, in Vancouver, one in Saskatoon and one in Winnipeg? Or is that all? Is that the whole delivery system? Will people have to travel 700 or 800 miles from the extreme southern part of Alberta to Edmonton, for example, or will there be a more elaborate structure put in place? We need to know this information. The program has now been in place, in the case of the Atlantic development authority, since June. The Prime Minister announced that it would be in business the following day. In the case of western Canada, I believe the announcement of the program was made in August. We are now into March of the following year and people still do not even know where the offices are located or the terms and conditions under which they can make an application for some of this $1.1 billion that is supposed to be available for diversification.

Can the minister advise us of these things so that people in western Canada know where they should make their applications?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can do that with regard to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Indeed, we have an effective information program under way in the Atlantic provinces and elsewhere to acquaint people with the agency, what it offers, and where our numerous clientele might present themselves. We have been putting out pamphlets, we have under way a direct mail campaign and a newspaper advertising campaign. I am sure that all of this will be possible for the Western Economic Diversification Agency. I note that Bill C-113 is before the other place. It is a bill to establish the Department of Western Economic Diversification. It was in the course of that debate that my colleague, Mr. McKnight, spoke yesterday. My honourable friend can obtain all the information he is seeking either by waiting until that bill comes before the Senate, when the minister will appear before the appropriate committee, or—and I commend this route to him—by using the technique of pre-study, in which case we could bring the minister here at a much earlier date to answer questions.

Senator Olson: There is something that needs to be said about the matter of the time delay from August 1987 to March 1988. That is how much time passed between the announcement of the program and the time at which the government finally introduced the bill. If you read the debates you will find that the government announced the western diversification program in early August of last year. I am trying to get some information so that people can begin making applications. Is there an office in place in Edmonton? I understand that Bruce Rawson has been appointed at the deputy minister level to administer this program in western Canada. If the Leader of the Government thinks that I should be doing a lot of homework to find these answers, I suppose I could do that. I would remind him, however, that he did not do that when he was on this side of the chamber; he always asked me to do it for him. That is why I am asking him to do it now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am glad that my friend has mentioned the appointment of Mr. Bruce Rawson, whose appointment took place shortly after the announcement of the agency by the Prime Minister last August. Mr. Rawson has been in place and the agency has been up and going since that date. As with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, various existing programs, such as the IRDP, the responsibility for the ERDAs, and so forth, were transferred to the agency and to its minister, Mr. McKnight. The agency has been up and going since that date. Legislation is being brought in now. New programs are being designed and the agency is very much in action. As I say, if my friend is looking for the names, addresses and telephone numbers of contacts in the western diversification agency, I do not have them off the top of my head. I shall undertake to get that information for him, and, once again, I recommend to him the technique of pre-study so that he can have the minister appear before the committee at an early date to obtain all the information he needs about this agency.

Senator Frith: Nice try the second time!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN SIKH COMMUNITY—DISTRIBUTION AND PURPORT OF MINISTER'S LETTER

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have here a copy of a letter that was sent to Premier Peterson of Ontario, signed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark. I would like to read part of that letter into the record. It begins:

I am writing to you concerning possible invitations to you or members of your government to attend functions organized by members of the Canadian Sikh community.

Later on it reads:

There are... three Sikh organizations which exist largely to advocate the creation of an independent Sikh state, known as "Khalistan." These three organizations are the Babbar Khalsa, the International Sikh Youth Federation... and the World Sikh Organization. Some members of these organizations have also engaged in or promote violent activities aimed at Indian interests in Canada and elsewhere.

The first question I would like to ask the leader is: Why did the Secretary of State advise only the premiers of certain provinces and not members of the Senate and not members of the House of Commons? If this is a situation that merits the attention of legislators, then everyone should have been advised.

My second question is: Why would the Secretary of State tar with the same brush the entire Sikh community by saying, "Some members of these organizations"? In other words, everybody in the community is suspect, if these people are, indeed, engaged in violent activities.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with respect to the first part of the question, I shall have to inquire to see whether a similar alert was sent to legislators at any time by the Department of External Affairs. Whether it was or was not, the honourable senator and other legislators can consider themselves advised of the publication of this letter to the provincial premiers. The reason the letter was sent is that the government does not, and should not, support individuals or organizations who advocate the use of violence. As my colleague has pointed out, some members of those organizations do advocate or promote the use of violence in the pursuit of their objective—their objective being the dismemberment of a country with which Canada has close and friendly relations. The presence of Canadian officials, elected or otherwise, at meetings of these organizations is a significant irritant, as my friend can understand, in our relationship with India.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman did not answer the question I asked him. When the Secretary of State refers to "some members of these organizations," in fact, the Secretary of State is painting with the same brush the entire community. I think this creates suspicions and a feeling of collective guilt, if I may use that expression. I do not think a minister, particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, should use such expressions in his correspondence, which tend to create this kind of situation.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the comments of the honourable senator, but the government and the minister stand by that statement. Some members of these organizations do, in fact, advocate the use of violence in attaining the objective of the establishment of this separate state, and, far from tarring all of the members, I thought the minister was careful to say that "some" of its members so advocate.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—SENATE TIMETABLE FOR COMPLETION OF DELIBERATIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Molgat, but he is like the Scarlet Pimpernel. One moment he is here, and the next moment he is gone!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): His colour is "red", Senator Flynn, it is not "scarlet"!

Senator Flynn: Yes, but it is not in his capacity as a "red" that I would have asked him the question, but in his capacity as chairman of the Committee of the Whole with a mandate to study the Meech Lake agreement.

Today we were reminded by newspapers that the six month period for the adoption of the resolution on that agreement in the House of Commons will expire on April 23, 1988. I understand that until then, at least till the end of this month, the Committee of the Whole sitting every Wednesday has witnesses to hear. Then there is the Easter period, which leaves very little time.

I would like to know exactly what agenda the Committee of the Whole has, and whether the chairman indicates that as long as the Committee of the Whole has not completed its work—I don't know how they want to do that, by tabling a report or not—the Senate cannot consider Senator Murray's motion to approve the Meech Lake constitutional agreement.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray's motion is not before us at this point.

Senator Flynn: It is on the Order Paper.

Senator Frith: Yes, but it has not been put forward.

Senator Flynn: It is on the Order Paper. I would like to know if we can consider that motion debatable before the Committee of the Whole has completed its work.

Senator Frith: If Senator Murray wants to put it forward, why not?

Senator Flynn: If Senator Frith feels he has authority to answer on behalf of Senator Molgat, I have no objection.

Senator Frith: This I do not have. Go ahead.

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Honourable senators, I am sorry I was not in my seat at the beginning of this question but I understand it was directed to me, Senator Flynn.

As far as I am concerned, I would feel that if Senator Murray is ready to put his motion forward, there is no problem to a debate starting and proceeding. I would assume it would not end before Senator Murray's appearance before the Committee of the Whole.

As he will recall, Senator Murray, the Committee—

Senator Flynn: After the—

Senator Molgat: The steering committee originally proposed that we invite Senator Murray right at the start of our discussion, last June. Since we could not find a date that could accommodate everybody, this was postponed on a number of occasions.

Just after the Christmas recess, I asked Senator Murray when he would be willing to appear, and he indicated he would prefer to wait until the end of the hearings.

I thought that would be in the first week of sitting after Easter, on April 12, I presume, if we come back on the Tuesday.

I hoped Senator Murray would be ready to appear before the committee at that time.

However, if he wishes to move his motion before that date, I do not mind.

Senator Flynn: If I understand correctly, you are saying that in your opinion the Senate should not take a final stand on Senator Murray's motion before the Committee of the Whole has completed its work?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I thought it would be wiser to hear all the witnesses.

So far, beside Senator Murray, the last witness would be Mr. Trudeau on March 30. He will be followed by Senator Murray. If the Senate is willing to hear Senator Murray on a Tuesday, let us say on April 12, if that was agreeable to everyone, we could then conclude the hearings. The Senate could then debate the matter for a week, if it decided to pass a resolution before April 23; we could vote on the matter, let us say, on Thursday, April 21.

Senator Flynn: Does that mean the Committee of the Whole will have a report to make to the Senate?

It is difficult for me to see when this report could be prepared. Besides, I fail to see how the Senate in Committee of the Whole could draft a report. We have the report of the Task Force that travelled to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. That is one thing. We do not know what the chairman wants to do about it. I think it is all very complicated and that, in any event, the Senate must decide on this issue before the expiration, on April 23, of the six-month period after which anything we might say or do will not make any difference at all.

This would not even have the moral suasion value which the chairman of the Committee of the Whole and a few of the opponents of the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord undoubtedly have in mind.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just to set the record straight, if Senator Flynn will let me. Perhaps he did not want to put it exactly in such terms, but the Constitution does not stipulate that the Senate has to state its position before the end of the 180-day period.

Senator Flynn: I did not say that.

Senator Frith: No. Very well.

[Senator Flynn.]

I had the impression somebody said the Senate had to state its position before April 23. There is no such stipulation but, if we have not done so the House of Commons still has an opportunity to do something.

Senator Flynn: I was very careful. What I mean to say is that if we failed to take a position, that of course would be tantamount to giving a negative response. What I suggested is that I think it would not be a very honourable position for the Senate to do nothing, to lack the courage to say where it stands before the time limit arrives.

Senator Frith: It is not a question of courage.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Surely Senator Frith will agree with me that the important aspect is that each senator be given an opportunity to state his or her views on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord before April 23.

Senator Frith: I agree that that is not necessary but desirable.

REFUGEES

THAILAND—TURNING BACK OF BOATS—SAFETY OF PASSENGERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, recent reports indicate that the country of Thailand has been flooded with refugees. Certain press reports indicate that boatloads of people purporting to be refugees have been turned back, resulting in death by drowning on the high seas.

As a result of those reports, there have been further reports that western countries, including Canada, have made representations, directly or indirectly, to the Government of Thailand respecting the safety and security of those people that may be on such boats pointed towards the shores of Thailand in order to ensure that more tragic deaths do not occur.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us what the government's position has been in connection with these matters and indicate what the government's general policy is?

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

CRITERIA FOR PROGRAM SUPPORT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate for some clarification, and, if need be, the leader can take the question as notice. The clarification I seek relates to questions I asked a few minutes ago. He said that for all practical purposes the western economic diversification administration has been up and running—I am sure those were his words—since August or September of last year. Could the leader tell us what the criteria will be? If some correspondence in this regard has been printed and circulated, it did not get to my office.

I am asking this question, because in an explanation given by the minister responsible yesterday he had this to say:

This is not an entitlement program. If we take a look at previous experiences, entitlement was part of it. This program is not entitlement; it is managed with flexibility and creativity. We will see what projects . . . should be supported.

What does that mean: "We will see what projects should be supported"? Are there to be no terms, conditions or criteria set out so that those who make application will know what programs ought to be supported?

The minister responsible went on to say:

For example, there will be loan guarantees, credit and loan insurance, contributions, repayable contributions, and grants. All economic sectors will be eligible—

With very little imagination one can see what might happen to a program set out with those kinds of criteria. I am wondering if there is not some more precise way to manage the taxpayers' funds.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, once again, I can make inquiries of my colleague, Mr. McKnight. Once again, I commend to my honourable friend the technique of pre-study to bring the western diversification program legislation to this house so that he and other honourable senators can question the minister directly.

However, if I may reflect for a moment again on the experience of the Atlantic provinces, we had found that the entrepreneurs in that region felt that with the old and existing programs there were altogether too many criteria, that those incentive programs were strangling in red tape, that the criteria were devised in Ottawa, administered in Ottawa, and utterly insensitive to the needs of the region. These are the programs my honourable friend was responsible for and which he looks upon with such nostalgia today.

Therefore, what we have tried to do is put as much flexibility as possible into those programs so that the incentive programs are in a position to bring assistance to the widest possible range of business and business-related activity.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I find it strange, indeed, that the leader constantly gets up—and this is the third time he has done this—and says, "If we do a pre-study, we can bring the minister, and then we can find out what the programs are all about, what the terms, conditions, criteria, and so forth, will be."

● (1430)

A few minutes ago he said the programs were up and running months ago. Surely there should be some kind of specific or, at least, definite terms and conditions that need to be met in order to apply. That is all I am asking. Do the people of western Canada have to wait for me and my colleagues to call the minister before a committee in order to find out what is in the program? It seems to me that that is a reasonable question, and that people have the right to know. I wish the minister would quit playing these funny little games. If the program is up and running, surely the government must know what it will do; it does not require an interrogation by me, or anyone else, of the minister to find out.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has suggested that I should take the question as notice insofar as it relates to specific situations, and I have done that.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

By word of explanation, we have some witnesses from out of town who are to appear before us on our study of Bill C-60, and we would like to hear them shortly after four o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if the committee is prepared to come to order, we have two submissions this afternoon. The first witness is Mr. Izzy Asper, Q.C. I will ask Mr. Asper to join us.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Izzy Asper was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome Mr. Asper. You have received a copy of his biography as well as a copy of his brief, so it will not be necessary for me to make an extensive introduction. I presume that my colleagues will, however, allow me to mention particularly that I am pleased to see a fellow Manitoban, and, in this particular case, one who occupied the very seat I occupied for a period of time in Manitoba.

So, Mr. Asper, you have one hour at your disposal. Our normal procedure is to allow for 15 or 20 minutes of comments, followed by questions from senators. If you are ready to proceed, I will give you the floor.

Mr. Izzy Asper, Q.C.: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. I wish to express my appreciation to you for giving me the opportunity to be heard on the issue before you.

I want to make it clear that I am here as a private citizen, but one who has for over 30 years, whether as a lawyer, a journalist, a leader of a political party in Manitoba, or as a businessman and a councillor of the Canada West Foundation, spoken out on constitutional issues.

I have always urged that the Constitution-making process should not be closed until all the concerns and grievances of western Canadians and, indeed, of those of all lesser populated provinces are addressed and remedied concurrently with those of Quebec.

Our legitimate issues should not be left to simmer on the back burner. Yet the Meech Lake-Langevin agreement and amendment do just that. As a Canadian who feels at home in all parts of Canada, but who was born and lived his life in western Canada, I am here to tell you and urge upon you that that is unacceptable. It will simply dash the hopes of westerners and tell them to look elsewhere for justice.

Now, I should feel comfortable making these comments in this chamber because of my understanding of the hopes of the Fathers of Confederation when the Senate was established. It was to be a house of sober, second thought, where regional representation would counterbalance the representation-by-population concept of the House of Commons; where decisions would be made on the basis of what was just, equitable and in the best interests of all Canadians, without the temptations of political or partisan opportunism. Never more than on this issue is such a Senate needed to fulfill that promise.

It should be a matter of great regret for most thinking Canadians to reflect on the consequences of removing the Senate veto over constitutional amendment from the 1982 Constitution Act, because this body, which was established to protect the small, the weak and the minorities, is legally unable to veto the Meech amendment. That amendment profoundly, and virtually unalterably, discriminates against the very people that the Senate was established to protect.

Still, honourable senators, this body must play its role within that 1982 constraint. It can lend its prestige and credibility, through its report, to those who have pledged to resist this monumental mistake and prevent irreparable harm to this and yet unborn generations. A strong Senate recommendation for significant amendment, or withdrawal of what I call the "Meech madness," will provide leadership and endorsement of those who wish to write and speak out in favour of nation-building, as opposed to nation-freezing, if not nation-destroying.

I ask you to do just that—to light a beacon which will illuminate the flaws and fatalities that have polluted Meech Lake.

Some of you who attended will know that I made a written as well as an oral submission on this subject to the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons last summer. That committee reported, as you know, on September 9, 1987, but it did not satisfactorily address the arguments I raised. Since I have to regard this chamber as the final court of appeal, I have tabled with the Clerk that 50-page submission, and I adopt it again in these proceedings.

The Meech amendment has attracted valid criticism on a number of grounds. It is open to criticism, because (a) the process was anti-democratic; (b) the "distinct-society" clause denigrates fundamental rights; (c) the future of our northern development has been put into a straitjacket; (d) strong national government has been sacrificed by the opting-out provisions, the Supreme Court provisions and the Senate appointment formula; (e) the immigration and population-control arrangements are anathema to the development of western Canada; (f) the amending formula guarantees that we cannot break out of the straitjacket in the future; and (g) therefore, there is little likelihood that there ever will be a satisfactory western amendment.

While I am prepared to discuss all of these aspects with you, there are many other, more eloquent spokespersons on most of these aspects, and so I will concentrate in my oral presentations on those issues that most significantly affect my region and on which too few critics are commenting.

Overall, though, my paramount conclusion is that the Meech-Langevin agreement and the amendment are fatally flawed and should be set aside. Alternatively, all issues should be more thoroughly debated in public, in the media and in the legislatures and Parliament, without time constraints. These hearings should be extended and held across the country. Attempts should be made to eliminate the most unacceptable provisions of these documents; but, if the government is determined to proceed without significant amendment, then I urge that a national referendum be recommended on a "yes" or "no" basis and that the results in each province be agreed to be taken as that province's vote under the present amending formula. At the very least, I hope you will recommend a "free vote" throughout Canada on the amendment.

Concurrent with the process of having extended hearings, debate and, if necessary, referenda, I hope you will recommend that the First Ministers and the Prime Minister go back to the drawing board to negotiate the necessary amendments, as well as the addition and inclusion of those things that are missing, in order to redress western grievances, which are chiefly the lack of an economic bill of rights and a Triple-E Senate.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

There must be linkage between the passage of the Meech Lake Accord—which I refer to as the “Quebec amendment”—and the adoption of what I call the “western amendment,” namely, an economic bill of rights and a Triple-E Senate. I take it we all interpret Triple E to mean: having an equal number of members from each province, being elected, and having effective power. Linkage is essential, because without it there will never be an equitable western agreement.

In my written submission I complain about the entire process being followed here. We have a secret deal, made in a back room, under intense pressure, following which a reluctant federal government agrees, also under pressure, to hold brief hearings, but states that unless egregious or fundamental errors are discovered the amendment will be passed without changes. These hearings were held for only a few weeks, in the dog days of summer, and only in Ottawa, making it too costly and too time consuming for many Canadians to participate. To top it off, the committee was required to report to Parliament by September 14, making it impossible for all those who might otherwise have wished to be heard to be included in the proceedings. I understand that fewer than half of the people who asked to be heard were heard. The dessert came on September 9, 1987, when the joint committee did report, did find flaws, but recommended that Parliament pass it anyway.

This process brings into disrepute our Canadian democratic institutions. Those hearings have been characterized as a “sham” to mask the fact that the government did not want to allow public opinion to be aroused before Meech Lake was a done deed.

In contrast, we took five years after the Constitution Act, 1982—from 1982 to 1987—to find an accommodation with Quebec. There was no need to have that accommodation rammed through in five months. When the Canadian flag was introduced by Mr. Pearson, nearly six months of parliamentary debate was allowed. The flag was only the symbol of our sovereignty—the Constitution is the very substance of it, and it is, therefore, worthy of even more public consideration and parliamentary debate.

I have suggested in my paper that the immigration control clauses will surely lead to proportional provincial population growth only and will thus freeze each of the provinces at its present proportionate position in Canada. For Manitoba, a freeze at our current position of 4.85 per cent of the population, or thereabouts, means we will be consigned in perpetuity to political and economic insignificance, as will most other provinces, with no hope of breaking out of that vise. For us and provinces like us, this means a continuation of have-not status and the continuation of central Canadian domination and the colonialism that we have known for the last 120 years.

Western Canadians, or less-populated provinces, will be denied the opportunity to contribute to a greater Canada and will be forced to remain part of the hinterland to be known as “outer Canada.”

At the same time, I also have grave concerns over the possibility that the whole thrust of the amendment is to grant sovereignty-association status to Quebec.

By combining the distinct society provisions with the present proportion of population guarantee, plus Supreme Court entitlements, Senate appointment powers and a constitutional amendment veto for Quebec, we give a chuckling René Lévesque almost everything he ever wanted—without any of the trauma!

But these amendments should also raise other, serious concerns for Quebecers. I refer to the words which would “centre francophones in Quebec,” and I ask: Is this a form of ghettoization? Apartheid, Canadian-style? And is the provision allowing Quebec’s proportion of Canada’s population to rise by 5 per cent over its present proportion, “for certain demographic reasons,” a veiled form of racism?

There are those who suggest that to adopt the various interpretations I have placed on the Meech Lake Accord is to see ghosts. I do not agree. This is self-evident on any reasonable reading of the agreement and the proposed changes to section 95.

But if I am wrong, and I would very much like to be wrong, then it is the fault of yet more ambiguous drafting. If I am under a misapprehension, then that can readily be cured by a statement to that effect by all the premiers and the Prime Minister and a clear-cut redrafting to say that the policies of Canada shall be used and shall be such that the population of this country will spread, as practically as possible, evenly from sea to sea so that political and economic power will be enjoyed equally across the nation. Silence on this point only confirms my worst fears and establishes that these documents were intended to mislead the public.

On the distinct society clauses and Quebec’s ability to legislate to develop that distinctiveness, I am suggesting that they may be void for uncertainty because of the ambiguity thereof, but, nevertheless, they have frightening overtones on economic rights, minority rights, anglophone rights, ethnic rights, women’s rights, and many other things yet unforeseen. Canadians, those Canadians who are now constitutionally “indistinct,” are entitled to know exactly what all this means.

You have heard much on this already, and I am sure it is well recognized that a full definition is required and, as well, for certainty, the Charter of Rights must be declared to supersede all provisions of the Meech Lake amendments. In this case I suggest that “distinct” may be a euphemism for “separate.”

Similarly, on the fact that Quebec civil code judges are required on the Supreme Court, I have to object that there is no requirement that each other province also be represented on that court.

I will not elaborate on the concerns over the opt-out-with-compensation concepts, as you are no doubt considering other submissions on this point.

As well, my submission protests against the new requirement of unanimity for constitutional amendment on several issues. That simply means that there never will be any. The drafters have taken a snapshot of Canada, worshipped at the altar of the status quo and enshrined it, warts and all, into pragmatically unshakeable chains. We can thus bid farewell to constitutionally protected interprovincial free trade, a Triple-E Senate, individual right to property, interprovincial mobility of capital, and, in the very words of the preamble to the agreement, "equality of the provinces."

The amendment is simply a betrayal of those words, and it makes a hollow mockery of that pious preamble.

This body, supporting one of its earlier reports, should recommend that at the very least we should acknowledge the principle that the Senate should be elected by providing in the Meech Lake amendment that the new provincial nominees, rather than be appointed by the premier of the province, be elected by the people of the province concerned. If we cannot have Triple E, let us not substitute it with Triple P—Provincial Premiers' Patronage!

● (1450)

In my written submission to the joint committee I attached a detailed proposal for Triple-E Senate reform, in terms adopted by the Canada West Foundation. It, unlike the Meech Lake documents, is not cast in concrete, but forms the basis of a useful dialogue. I would be happy to discuss it with senators in the time we have available. I submit that its adoption, or something akin to it, will return us to nation-building and not nation-freezing in the ice of Meech Lake.

Mr. Chairman, westerners have been asked to "go along," because the window for bringing Quebec into the family will otherwise close. That simply is not true, but in any event we cannot do it. We, too, are anxious for Quebec to come into the family, but not if the price is for us to remain the orphans of Confederation. We also want in, not out; but if we can only be in as colonials then that is to fan the flames of extremism.

Western thinkers are openly asking what we have to do to get Canada's attention—elect a separatist provincial government? No, western Canadians cannot simply go along—the list of inequities is too long, the evidence too conclusive that the dice are loaded, the deck is stacked, the game is fixed, all against us and in favour of central Canada. We cannot forget our history of patiently waiting for Canada to do equity by us, only to be disappointed time and time again by federal governments. I refer senators to my written brief for a list of specific examples of the western indictment.

I conclude, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, by saying that it is time for a gesture, a signal of renewed leadership from Quebec. It is therefore only appropriate, as Quebec again takes its place at the table, that it should lead in demanding that the western amendment be adopted concurrently so that we may all sit down at that table together and, at the same time, as genuine equals, just as the preamble to the Meech Lake agreement and the constitutional amendment say.

I thank you for your patience and await your questions.

[Mr. Asper.]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Asper. We will now proceed to the question period. First on my list is Senator Gigantès, who will be followed by Senator Neiman.

Senator Gigantès: Welcome, and thank you, Mr. Asper. My questions will be brief. What do you mean by an economic bill of rights for the West?

Mr. Asper: It is not only for the West, senator, it is for Canada, but western spokespersons over the last several decades have felt most aggrieved by the lack of what I am referring to as an economic bill of rights. Interprovincial mobility, the free movement of people, was given to us only in the 1982 Constitution amendment. We still do not have interprovincial freedom of mobility of capital. We still do not have interprovincial free trade on goods. Provinces can and do discriminate against the goods manufactured in other provinces.

In my written submission I gave a number of examples of this sort of thing, and I can recall one of them. A number of years ago the Government of Quebec passed legislation to prevent the acquisition of a Quebec-based company by an Atlantic-based financial institution. Not long after that the Government of British Columbia passed legislation to prevent the acquisition of MacMillan Bloedel by Canadian Pacific, a Quebec-based company. That is a flaw in the economic structure of Canada that I would like to see corrected at the same time as we finish the task of nation-building.

Senator Gigantès: I thank you for that answer, which is most illuminating. You said the immigration clauses might freeze population proportions. I do not think there are any such clauses in the United States, but the northern tier of states bordering upon the western provinces have not developed in terms of population or economics as have some other parts of the United States. In fact, one of the arguments against free trade is that the U.S. northern tier is doing less well than the Canadian provinces to the north of it.

Is the fact that population growth is not at a rate that satisfies westerners due to constitutional factors or other factors such as may have prevailed in parts of the United States that have not seen the kind of population growth they would like to see?

Mr. Asper: Senator, there is an awful lot to your question, and I will try to break it into some of its parts. It is true that the American Constitution does not address population as part of nation-building, but because, in the United States, they have a bicameral system in which the upper house is equally representative of all the states, two senators per state, it means that North Dakota, for example, stands as an equal to New York and can bargain effectively on matters of economic development. It is something like a Catch 22 situation: population goes for opportunity; opportunity arises where the political power exists to create it; therefore, all essential political opportunity and economic opportunity in this country has been centred in Ontario and Quebec, because there has been no national policy to decentralize.

I am saying that in terms of nation-building we can learn both positives and negatives by watching the American experience. It is still dramatically better than ours. Whenever you see a rocket go up in Cape Kennedy you know that it has created jobs there. But that rocket was manufactured in California, where it also created jobs, and was monitored from Houston, creating jobs there. We do not have an example of economic federalism as good as that in this country. We have CF-18 outrages; we have the transfer of the overall base of Air Canada out of Winnipeg, taking thousands of economic opportunities out of Manitoba. We do not have economic federalism in Canada.

Senator Gigantès: I have one last question, sir. You spoke of Mr. Lévesque and said that he must be laughing. The one who seems to be doing the most laughing is Mr. Bourassa. What Mr. Lévesque got was opting out, with full compensation, of the gang of eight, of which he was one member. Mr. Bourassa has got opting out with full compensation plus the veto, which Mr. Lévesque had given up. How do you expect Mr. Bourassa to retreat from a political situation in which he is saying he has done more for Quebec than the separatists? He has given Quebec more power and independence than the separatist Premier Lévesque had asked for.

Mr. Asper: I agree with your observations, senator. In fact, I think it was Mr. Trudeau who quoted Mr. Bourassa as having said, "Gosh, I got more than I asked for—I got more than I wanted, but I couldn't say no." I think it is also illuminating to consider Mr. Parizeau's remarks of two or three days ago during his campaign for the leadership of the PQ in Quebec. He said that Meech Lake provides a very useful advance forward on which they can base the next move to separatism, to sovereignty, and that it is just wonderful.

That is why I concluded my remarks by stating that, in my view, it is time for a gesture. I think Premier Bourassa is the proper person to make that gesture. He can give something to the rest of Canada without losing the essence of the things he needs to make Quebec comfortable within the union. I talk about the Triple-E Senate; obviously, if Quebec and Ontario do not agree on it, it is not going to happen. It is a giving up of power. If there is not enough good will in this country, where someone who has won can give something back, then I think it is possible to refer to Meech Lake as having the potential to be nation-destroying.

● (1500)

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Gigantès.

Honourable senators, before I call on the next questioners I should like to inform you that I have eight names on my list; so I shall have to cut the list off temporarily at least and ask that honourable senators try to be concise in their questions. The next questioner is Senator Neiman, followed by Senator MacDonald (Halifax).

Senator Neiman: Mr. Asper, we are glad to have you with us today and to hear another western perspective. I doubt that you have had an opportunity yet to read through the report of the task force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and Northwest Territories, which was tabled in this chamber yesterday. The report contains seven recommendations. I will not refer to all of them, but I would like to get your personal reaction to some of them, and, if you feel that the people of Manitoba might have a slightly different viewpoint, I would appreciate hearing from you on it.

Recommendation 4 is to the effect that the Meech Lake Accord be amended so that any change in the boundaries between the provinces and the territories would occur only with the consent of the territory concerned.

Do you think that that is an appropriate and fair recommendation?

Mr. Asper: Yes, I do. That opinion is probably fairly widely shared in Manitoba. There is at present a political stirring in Manitoba within Premier Pawley's particular party. This weekend his political party will face a convention. I would put the odds at nearly 50-50 that a resolution will carry which, when one reads it through, will send a message to the Pawley administration perhaps to withdraw from the accord or to demand significant amendments, including one for the protection of northern and native rights. I believe that as of a few days ago approximately 20 New Democratic constituency organizations on the provincial side in Manitoba had passed and tabled resolutions for this week's convention to that effect, calling for amendment to the Meech Lake Accord for some of those reasons.

Senator Neiman: I see that you have a copy of the report. Recommendation 5 recommends that:

—the attainment of provincial status by Yukon and the Northwest Territories be accomplished solely through negotiations with the federal government, subject only to the approval of the federal government and the particular territory concerned.

Do you think that that recommendation is a valid one?

Mr. Asper: I concur heartily with that recommendation, because it is a matter between the people of Canada and not the ten fiefdoms. The people of Canada, particularly the people of the North, and the federal government must retain the power to make that arrangement. I think I can say that this view is fairly widely shared in Manitoba. I think that responsible leadership in both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party has taken that position.

Senator Neiman: What is your opinion with respect to recommendation 7, which says that the proposed Constitution amendment which recognizes Quebec as a distinct society should also recognize that the aboriginal peoples of Canada constitute distinct societies?

Mr. Asper: I have a little trouble with that recommendation because of, as I indicated in my earlier comments, my views on the distinct society clause. Certainly if Quebec is to be a distinct society, then clearly our native and northern communities are also distinct societies. I have some problems with giving in to that wording at this point.

I would remind the Senate of November 1986. Senator Gigantès, this is perhaps why I believe that we can get the Quebec amendment and the Quebec accommodation that we all want. In November 1986 the Liberal Party held a national convention and concurrently at the same convention passed essentially the Quebec amendment, which was acceptable to Quebecers, and the recommendation for a Triple-E Senate as parts of its policy. I do not think we are faced with blackmail. We can make a deal concurrently with Quebec. The phrase "distinct society" is negotiable. Everything is negotiable, but I am not conceding it yet.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Mr. Asper, I congratulate you on your very thoughtful submission which, in your usual way, you presented with a great deal of passion. I have a couple of questions to ask you with regard to Senate reform. At page 14 of your brief you say:

—at the very least we should acknowledge the principle that the Senate should be elected, by providing in the Meech amendment that the new provincial nominees, rather than be appointed by the premier of the province, be elected by the people of the province concerned.

What is in the Meech Lake Accord that suggests that the provinces will appoint senators?

Mr. Asper: The proposal that the Prime Minister will appoint senators only from lists submitted by provincial premiers makes it axiomatic that the selection of senators will be from a list of persons that is satisfactory to the particular province.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): I would think that as a distinguished lawyer you would be more precise. You say, "appointed by the premier of the province." That is not the case.

Mr. Asper: That is de facto the case.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): The provinces could submit 50 names and the Prime Minister, whose prerogative it is to make these appointments, could turn down all 50 names.

Mr. Asper: I do not want to split hairs or quibble over the wording, but the net effect is that senators will be selected by the provinces within a foreseeable period of time—appointed by the Prime Minister, but selected by the provinces.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Perhaps they could be nominated by the provinces. However, since you suggest that everything is negotiable, conversations could be taking place that involve no one in the list.

Mr. Asper: Everything is negotiable until this accord is passed. Then nothing is negotiable and unanimity is required.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Obviously, you have an enthusiasm for the so-called Triple-E proposal.

Mr. Asper: I said that I like it. It is negotiable because it is not etched in stone, as I said. The Senate published a report outlining its version of Senate reform, which is a starting point for dialogue. However, I lean toward the Triple-E method as being the most effective method.

[Mr. Asper.]

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Would you care to comment on Premier Getty's suggestion of some form of election that would have the effect of electing a nominee, who may or may not be acceptable to the Prime Minister who has the prerogative of making the appointment? I realize that you are not from his province, but are you of the same mind as Premier Getty on this matter?

Mr. Asper: I want to make sure that I understand the honourable senator. Today I said that, if the Senate of Canada is unwilling to take the position that I take, then, at the very least, the appointments should be made from a list of one name, that being the name of the person who has won a province-wide election. That would be the name that the premier would put forward. If that is what you were suggesting as the "Getty concept," then I support it.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Yes, very well. By a Triple-E proposal, do you mean something that involves a direct election and would give Prince Edward Island the same representation as Alberta, Ontario or Quebec? The proposal would give the Senate what it calls "effective powers," but what is not clear is what those powers would be. Therefore, the question that I put to you now, and it is an important question, is this: If new powers are to be given to the Senate, then they must be taken from somewhere else; do the people who are advocating a Triple-E Senate want to take those powers away from the House of Commons? If they do, who resolves a dispute between a Senate and a House of Commons with equal powers?

You also made a reference to ten fiefdoms. With respect to the so-called federal-provincial conferences, which were never originally envisaged but which recently seem to have become institutionalized or glorified, where do you see them going under the concept of an elected Senate? Do they disappear, or do they have a role to play? I am talking now of powers.

Mr. Asper: I do not think that federal-provincial conferences ought necessarily to be enshrined in the Constitution. However, I do not feel strongly about it. I think they are useful, but they should not be used as an instrument of national government. That is the function of the House of Commons and the Senate, and I am certainly not prepared to agree that somehow we should delegate a law-making capacity to a committee of premiers headed by a chairman of the board.

That is just my view of Confederation. However, on the written submission that I made to the joint Senate and House of Commons committee, which I have tabled here today, I did attach a fairly detailed concept of the Triple-E Senate, and, as I say, I am not sure that it would not take considerable constitutional debate to settle each point. For example, I believe that, after the Triple-E concept was instituted, the Senate should not have a suspensive veto; it should have an absolute veto. It should not—

Senator Frith: What was that again? I did not hear that.

Mr. Asper: The Senate should have an absolute veto and then, I say, I am prepared to negotiate the exceptions. These would include such things, perhaps, as international treaties. However, in true federalism there is "rep. by pop." over here and "rep. by region" over there, and if they are in collision "rep. by region" must win. That is my view of Confederation.

The way in which you cure that—and that is why I have talked about the population clause—is that you say: "That is a little unbalanced," pointing to the usual situation involving Prince Edward Island. However, Alaska has a smaller population than Manitoba, and has two senators, and California has a greater population than all of Canada, but Alaska and California stand as equals. What I am saying is that if you do not like that, then order the country's immigration and economic development policy as I would recommend so that population will be spread equally so that "rep. by pop." will be fairer.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): If we are then to follow a United States model respecting the Senate, should we also follow a United States model respecting the distribution of powers?

Mr. Asper: We are opening up a broad subject.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Does your proposal not take away powers from the premiers?

Mr. Asper: I do not think they are in conflict at all. I think the powers of the premiers are set out in the 1867 Constitution, and from time to time they must be amended and honed. However, to date we have not had too much trouble with the provinces. I suppose if we have had problems with the division of powers in Canada, it is because the world changed after 1867 and some national programs were required or considered necessary. That situation did encroach on provincial powers, and accommodations had to be made—and probably always will have to be made.

As a matter of fact, I sought to become a provincial premier for one principal reason: I wanted to be at the bargaining table in Victoria in 1971, because I thought the deal would be done then. Fortunately, it was not, and, unfortunately, I was not.

However, I believe the premier has a client called his province and he must represent that client vigorously, but within the context of powers that will change from time to time.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I have one last question.

The Chairman: Perhaps it might be a very short one, senator.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Asper: I simply want to ask you if advocates of a Triple-E Senate want to take, for instance, resource jurisdiction away from the provinces?

Mr. Asper: No. I made a comment to Senator Neiman when we were discussing the North negotiating to join Confederation as equals. One of our concerns is that, if provincial consent is required, there will be a possible grab some day for the resources of the North, and they will be blackmailed into accepting conditions of entry into the union. That is why I approve of the Senate recommendation.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator MacDonald.

Honourable senators, we are developing a time problem. We have 20 minutes left and I have six names on my first list plus one on my second list, if we manage to reach the second list, so I will ask honourable senators to keep their questions brief and concise in order to give a chance to everyone.

Honourable Senator Frith will be next, followed by Honourable Senator Everett.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I think I can help. I wanted to explore the Triple-E concept also. Senator MacDonald has done that and, although he did not ask all the questions I wanted to, I think I should pass and allow someone else to deal with another subject.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. Senator Everett, followed by Senator Spivak.

Senator Everett: Mr. Asper, on page 13 of your brief you refer to the amendment of section 42 and you state that, as a result of that amendment, we can thus bid farewell to constitutionally protected interprovincial free trade, a Triple-E Senate, individual right to property, and interprovincial mobility of capital. Is it not true that the amendment to section 42 would refer only to institutions and would not be effective in preventing those changes, other than the change to the Triple-E Senate?

Mr. Asper: In my judgment, if we do not get a Triple-E Senate, there will not be the legislative drive—and note I am not saying constitutional drive—to enact in Parliament the economic bill of rights. In other words, the one, I hope, will lead to the other. If there is ever a Triple-E Senate, I believe there will be enough political negotiating capacity amongst the lesser populated areas to be able to persuade the Government of Canada, through the Senate, to sponsor that kind of amendment.

Senator Everett: So you are saying that the amendments that you contemplate here would arise only if there were a Triple-E Senate; is that correct? In other words, they would only be effective if there were a Triple-E Senate.

Mr. Asper: Yes, I suppose I am agreeing with you, because I am saying that, if we do not get the economic bill of rights now, in the absence of a Triple-E Senate, I do not think we will ever have a chance of getting it. There will not be the political power or political will in the Parliaments of Canada. Therefore, I am saying: Enact it now.

Senator Everett: My second point is that you make a number of references on page 9 of your submission to the problem of the distinct society. You say:

Combining the Distinct Society provisions with the Present Proportion of Population guarantee, plus Supreme Court entitlements, Senate appointment powers, and Constitutional Amendment veto for Quebec, gives a chuckling Rene Levesque almost everything he ever wanted . . .

Then you go on to say, on page 11 at item 4:

The Distinct Society clauses and Quebec's ability to legislate to develop that Distinctiveness, may be void for uncertainty . . .

Then, on page 12, you say:

. . . the Charter of Rights must be declared to supersede all provisions of the Meech Amendments. In this case, I suggest that "Distinct" is a euphemism for "Separate".

As a lawyer, could you tell us what the effect of the term "distinct society" would be on the interpretation of the Constitution?

Mr. Asper: Senator Everett, if you are referring to the discussions that took place between some "constitutional" lawyers and members of the Senate and Commons joint committee, I thought they were less than helpful. When two people of basic intelligence take opposite views in interpreting legal statutes before they are passed or before an agreement is signed, for the sake of certainty why risk the interpretation being placed upon it by the courts where you thereafter cannot change it? So get it straight the first time.

My interpretation is that "distinct society" may likely supersede the Charter. There are a lot of people who agree with that legal position. However, it does not matter that someone disagrees. Correct it. What do you mean? Which is superior?

When that very simple and direct question was put, Premier Bourassa maintained that he thought distinct society overrode the Charter of Rights. If there is that kind of fundamental flaw in the drafting, for heaven's sake, fix it before you sign it.

The Chairman: Next on my list is Senator Spivak, followed by Senator Olson.

Senator Spivak: The ideas in your brief are certainly consistent with ideas that I, as a Manitoban, have heard you advocate over a number of years, and I compliment you on your brief. I would like to ask you a question in the area of equality rights, especially section 16, which you have not touched on very much.

As Senator Everett has said, on page 12 of your brief you say that "the Charter of Rights must be declared to supersede all provisions of the Meech amendments." Critics of the accord—particularly women's organizations, as has been mentioned quite often—have suggested that the Meech Lake Accord enters the field of equality rights selectively through section 16, that by recognizing aboriginal and multicultural rights in that section, and not others, it creates an inequality among the equality rights and, in effect, makes some equality rights more equal than others. The accord also makes these rights a structural element in Canadian federalism in a way that excludes gender from a comparable structural place.

You have suggested that the Charter of Rights must be declared to supersede all provisions of the Meech Lake amendments. As is evident, you are among the critics of the Meech Lake Accord. If you had the power to make any amendments, would you suggest that that is the way to fix that particular issue? Or would you prefer the way that some have suggested, which would be to add the question of equality rights in section 16? How do you view that whole issue?

Mr. Asper: It is a legitimate drafting and interpretation principle of law. It was referred to as expressio unius est exclusio alterius, which means that if you say something, then that specifically means something you do not say is not involved. I believe that we should err on the side of the general rather than the specific in statute drafting. Therefore, I begin by saying that this Charter of Rights supersedes every scrap of paper that follows. Period. I do not want to miss something by saying native rights, multicultural rights, or women's rights, because I would leave somebody out by inadvertence.

Senator Spivak: Do you believe that that would alleviate the concerns that many women's organizations have brought to bear? Is that your way of fixing that particular part?

Mr. Asper: I am not professing to still be an expert in drafting, but I think so. It should. On the other hand, I would be willing to listen very carefully to someone who felt uncomfortable.

The wonderful thing about a constitution is that it should make you feel good; it should make you feel proud; it should make you feel safe. If somebody does not feel safe, let us put words in that make him feel safe. I think that my general statement about the Charter superseding would cover it. However, if somebody made a reasoned argument that it was not enough, I would listen in order to err on the side of caution.

Senator Spivak: I am a little confused as to your position on the distinct society. On the one hand, you list all the horrible consequences that may result from the distinct society clause, and, on the other hand, you say that, if you had your druthers, you would concurrently negotiate the Triple-E Senate along with the distinct society. Is that a correct reading of what you say in this brief?

I would just make one comment. If that is that case, I would say to you, "Not so fast, Kowalski."

Mr. Asper: I don't think I said that. I hope I did not. Forget the word "distinct." What I did say was that the concerns of Quebec—which are legitimate concerns—can be met, as I mentioned earlier. The Liberal Party, with the support of Quebec and every other province, supported Triple E. The alleged anti-francophone sections of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta voted concurrently at the Liberal convention. They were able to come together. The word "distinct" is, to me, an unfortunate word to use. Perhaps the word "distinctive" would be appropriate, but we are splitting hairs again.

I did not mean to say that I would trade "distinct society" for Triple E. I believe that Triple E is non-negotiable.

The Chairman: The next speaker on my list is Senator Olson, followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Olson: Mr. Asper, I would like an explanation of what you mean by the words "western amendment," because you have used those words several times. I realize that you are talking about a Triple-E Senate, and I believe that you referred to freedom within the Commonwealth of Canada for the movement of trade contracts and capital and those sorts of things. I believe that you referred to it as an economic bill of rights. Is that all you mean by a western amendment, or is there something else that we need before we pass this group of amendments?

You seem to indicate that, if these amendments are passed, that will be the last time the Constitution will be amended.

Mr. Asper: Senator Olson, I did not mean to imply that. What I am saying is, if there is a Quebec sine qua non, the Quebec amendment, to me there is a western sine qua non. That does not suggest that that covers everything. I hope that we will be constitution-making for a while beyond this, but not in a straitjacket where unanimity is required for amendment.

In the economic bill of rights I did not list the components that one would expect to see. Let us take the example of the right of an individual to life and property. No civilized country that I know of has a modern constitution that does not talk about property rights. Our Constitution does not. I recall that in the House of Commons there was a considerable amount of debate, and at the end of that debate Prime Minister Trudeau said, "If you are prepared to give it expedited treatment, I will put in today 'property rights.'" He did not get the consent of the House of Commons and property rights are not in our Constitution.

Senator Olson: I expect the real reason for that is that they are within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Asper: The Prime Minister at the time had wording which would not offend provincial rights but which would protect property in our Constitution. It was the NDP who refused to give consent.

The Chairman: The next speaker on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

Senator Marsden: Mr. Asper, we are pleased to have you appear before us today. We have heard with great interest what you have had to say about the content of the Meech Lake Accord. I especially note your concerns for the Charter.

● (1530)

I would like to ask you a different question, one which relates to the process. You advocate that, if all else fails, there should be a national referendum, a "yes" or "no" on the Meech Lake process.

But suppose you were successful and the Meech Lake amendment were to be opened up for discussion of the western amendment, of a Triple-E Senate; how do you think it should be done? Should the premiers retire once again behind closed doors? Would you have an open tele-line conference, as we have had in the past? Should it involve only the premiers? Should there be people's assemblies? What is the modern constitutional process in Canada?

Mr. Asper: Senator Marsden, if I had my choice, I would begin on the classic footing that constitutions are too important to be made by politicians only. Therefore, I would advocate a constituent assembly, which is what I argued for back in the 1960s and 1970s, so that those members of the public that have an interest—whether they are educators, academics, students, women, natives, minorities, multiculturals, or people who need a constitution to ensure their equal development opportunities within the country—are involved, and that includes Manitobans who are disadvantaged.

Those of you who are from Manitoba know that 10 per cent of Manitoba's population are of native extraction and live in the indignity of intolerable poverty. They have to be part of the constituent assembly. I do not say that out of emotion; I say that as a fact.

We have a francophone minority in Manitoba—as does Saskatchewan, as the Supreme Court of Canada mentioned the other day. They have had their rights trampled on. They should be part of the constituent assembly. One begins with that process, and, ultimately, it goes to the political level, but only after the politicians have listened, have dialogued, have debated and made their cases.

I certainly do not think it is the monopoly of the premiers to make constitutions. Why not the mayors?

Senator Marsden: One short question.

The Chairman: Please make it a very short one, because the time allocated is almost up.

Senator Marsden: Yes, I will, Mr. Chairman.

What did Premier Pawley ask for when he went to the Meech Lake and Langevin meetings, and what did he get?

Mr. Asper: I am not sure, because the doors were locked. I think he asked once to be excused, but they would not let him out until he agreed, or something.

Senator Marsden: In other words, we do not know what Mr. Pawley wanted or what Mr. Bourassa wanted.

Mr. Asper: We do not know what trades were made. We do not know what compromises were made. You are absolutely right.

As I said, I think this has polluted the process, because it has brought the democratic process into disrespect. The most important thing one can do in one's country is to make one's constitution, and it has brought that process into disrespect with back-room deals.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marsden. The last questioner will be Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough). I must ask you to be brief.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I understand it, all the provinces of Canada except the Atlantic provinces have at one time or another been enriched by Canada out of the Territories by either enlargement or the transfer of natural resources.

Mr. Asper: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That makes me interested in the fifth proposal in the report of the task force. That addresses the provision in the Meech Lake Accord that the establishment of new provinces is hereafter to be subject to veto by all the provinces.

I realize, of course, that you were not there behind those locked doors, but why is it that provincial governments would want the power in contemporary economic circumstances to veto the establishment of the Yukon, for example, as a new and distinct Canadian province? Why do they want this new power, which Nova Scotia, for example, did not have when Quebec and Ontario were enriched in 1912?

Mr. Asper: I cannot answer. I can only tell you that there has been a propensity in constitutional negotiations since 1971 and before 1971 for the provinces to attempt continually to erode the central authority and to add power to the provincial side of the equation. I hope it is nothing worse than that.

But I must say that as I grow older I am becoming a little more cynical and less naive. I wonder how we would deal with the situation that currently exists between the Province of Quebec and the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador over power. I wonder what trading would go on and what price might be exacted for a provincial boundary change. That has nothing to do with it, but it has to do with economic blackmail. Perhaps Alberta would veto the Yukon unless it got downstream rights on a certain river, or whatever. I just do not want to turn Canada into a bickering, small-minded country, where local interests take precedence over the national interest.

The making of provinces, it seems to me, ought to be something between the people of Canada as a totality and the provinces, because those provinces, in my version, will have enormous power within Canada when there is a Triple-E Senate that would give the Yukon Territory, if it became a province, equality with Ontario. You have to weigh that carefully before you make that transaction, and, therefore, it should be done on behalf of the people.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let me ask one brief question on the same matter. Do you think it is proper that a province, Nova Scotia, for example, will be able, by reason of an absolute veto, to exercise bargaining power when there is the need to establish some form of provincial administration, in what is now the Yukon Territory, either by making the Yukon a new province or by enlarging British Columbia to include the Yukon? Do you think it would be legitimate for us in Nova Scotia to say that we wanted our quid pro quo for the solution of what might be urgent administrative problems in the Yukon Territory?

Mr. Asper: No, I do not. That is why I oppose the provincial veto in Meech. I say that because I believe it can be used for improper or unworthy purposes, as you have described. At least, I would describe it that way.

I do not want to see that power go to any one province so that it can intervene in a national issue and have a veto.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Asper.]

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Stewart.

We have come to the time allocated. I have three other senators on my list, Senators LeBlanc, Bosa and Haidasz. As a matter of fact, we have gone three minutes over the allocated time. Unless I am overruled, I will have to tell those three senators that we will not be able to entertain their questions.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, what prevents us from going on for another 10 or 15 minutes?

The Chairman: That is up to the committee.

Senator Bosa: I ask that, if the witness is willing to stay.

The Chairman: Is that the wish of the committee? We have other witnesses scheduled for four o'clock. I think in fairness to the other witnesses we should not go beyond four o'clock. If it is agreeable, we will go until four o'clock.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is agreeable.

The Chairman: All right. We will start with Senator LeBlanc, followed by Senator Bosa.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I will skip one question, because I think it has been covered.

One silence, Mr. Asper, in your interesting document relates to spending power. I was surprised that, as a former provincial politician, you did not focus on that, because I think Manitoba is in a situation similar to that of the Atlantic provinces. How do you feel about anything that weakens the power of the federal government to redistribute wealth in the country?

● (1540)

Mr. Asper: I prefaced my words on that section by saying that, while I feel strongly about this, there are many other eloquent spokespersons. If you read my brief, which I tabled today, I do deal with it extensively. I am fearful of any weakening of the federal power; it has been eroded enough. I am also deeply concerned about the "opting out with compensation" aspects. Unless someone redefines it and drafts it differently from what appears in the Meech Lake Accord, I do not know what comparable programs are; I do not know what some court will say 15 or 50 years from now, but I do see significant opportunity for loopholes on the "opting out with compensation" material. I do not want to have to decide that; why don't we fix it?

The same thing applies to any weakening of the federal power, of the redistribution of the essential services and the support of the social structure of the country. I can see an effect where we have a federal government that cannot do very much and cannot remedy situations, and is constantly haranguing constitutionally with the provinces over whether a particular program falls within this and that framework. I think we have decentralized a fair bit in Canada already in terms of constitutional power; I do not think it is necessary to go any further.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc. Next is Senator Bosa.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Asper, you have made an eloquent presentation in favour of rejecting the Meech Lake Accord. You have used expressions such as "economic blackmail," "the CF-18 outrages" and "bartering." Why did the premiers of all the western provinces in Canada not see the grievances that the West will experience, as you have presented them?

If I may put another question, since there was a lot of bartering here, did Newfoundland, who has a longstanding grievance with Quebec over the Churchill Falls Treaty, miss an opportunity to bargain, to review and to reopen that treaty?

Mr. Asper: That almost goes back to Senator Marsden's question. I agree with you. I find it astounding and absolutely an historically remarkable event that Meech Lake was signed. Premier Getty left Alberta holding a news conference, saying, "I shall not return without Triple E." What happened between there and the back room?

Why did they do it? That is why I say it goes back to Senator Marsden's comment about the closed-shop environment of the negotiations. Perhaps political considerations were given; perhaps hospitals were planned and military industries were offered. I do not know.

Senator Bosa: Frigates!

Mr. Asper: Frigates? Frigates, yes! Well, the frigates may backfire. They may sink.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Bosa. That concludes the list of questioners.

Mr. Asper, I want to thank you for preparing the brief in the first instance, and coming in person to share your views with us. It is much appreciated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: We will await the next witnesses.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mrs. Ginette Rodger and Mr. Michel Simard were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Our next witnesses are from the Canadian Nurses Association. We have with us Mrs. Ginette Rodger, Executive Director, and Mr. Michel Simard, Public and Government Relations Manager.

Mrs. Rodger, Mr. Simard, we have an hour at our disposal. We have received your brief and it has been distributed to all members of the committee. Is it your intention that both of you will speak, or will there be only one spokesperson?

Mrs. Ginette Rodger, Executive Director, Canadian Nurses Association: Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to make a presentation and highlight points in the brief, but I will not read the brief. Only I will be presenting. However, if necessary, Mr. Simard will also answer questions.

The Chairman: You may do one or the other. All right. As you know, you may use whichever of the official languages you prefer. That is entirely up to you.

You may proceed, then, and we will pose our questions following that.

[Translation]

Mrs. Rodger: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We are very pleased to have another opportunity to explain our position on the Constitutional Accord. As you mentioned earlier, I have with me Mr. Michel Simard, our head of public and governmental affairs, and I am the Executive Director of the Canadian Nurses Association.

Some of our members said it was probably a waste of time to explain our position on the Constitutional Accord again, because there does not seem to be a political will to make any changes.

We came here, however, because we believe this is a good opportunity to share with you our concerns about section 106A, which is about spending powers under the Constitutional Accord.

We also feel it is extremely important for you as decision-makers—you can influence decisions and hence our future—to hear the concerns shared by half of Canada's health system, in other words, our nurses who serve the public twenty-four hours a day, 365 days a year.

Our concerns are not new. The day after the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord was signed, we asked for the text and studied it carefully. After going through the text once, we communicated our concerns to Messrs. Mulroney, Turner and Broadbent, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and to the various health critics.

The most we got was an acknowledgment. We also contacted the media, unsuccessfully, however, to warn Canadians about the consequences of some of the changes proposed in the Accord, especially those dealing with spending powers.

The day before the final version was signed, we met with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Epp, to discuss the Accord. After informal meetings with politicians from all three parties, at both federal and provincial levels, we were convinced that our concerns were genuine.

I would like to say that the Canadian Nurses Association covers eleven provinces and territories, and that the purpose of the association is to grant the right to practise nursing. Our main concern, therefore, is to protect the public. We represent nurses from all provinces and have over 100,000 members.

The CNA has expressed its views on our health care system on several occasions: in 1980, when Judge Hall reviewed our health system; before the Macdonald Commission; and also in 1984, when we were very involved in the debate on the Canada Health Act.

I say this because I want you to realize that our concerns do not arise from a sudden desire to take part in a political debate but are based on our experience and thorough knowledge of the Canadian health care system.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, we want to highlight, and comment on, the effort made by the Prime Minister and the ten premiers to reach an agreement to allow the province of Quebec full political partnership in Confederation. However, we would like that to happen without endangering the Canadian health care system.

● (1550)

Clause 106A would allow the Government of Canada to provide reasonable compensation to provinces which chose not to participate in a national shared-cost program established federally so long as the province carried on a program compatible with the national objective. Our first concern related to that clause is with the definition of "compatible." Compatible may have different meanings. It may mean "not in a position to," or it may mean "conform to" or "similar to."

Our second concern relates to the definition of "national objective." As you know, interpretations of this may be very broad. You have had before you many texts of many representatives who have given different definitions of what the national objective would be. In fact, a representative of a provincial minister has given a different interpretation. If a national program were instituted in Canada to ensure primary health care services, which is, in fact, an objective of the World Health Organization which the Canadian government has subscribed to, that could mean that one province could develop clinics for mothers; another province could develop a store-front prevention program; and another province could develop a centre for the elderly. What would then happen in terms of ensuring universality and the national objective of ensuring that similar primary-health-care programs were available to all Canadians?

In other definitions others have suggested that, if a national objective were primary health care, the money for that objective could be put towards another national objective, such as the improvement of roads. You can imagine that the consequence of that would be to take some money earmarked for health and divert it to other programs.

We aired a different view of the national objective, and the response we received was to the effect that if we did not agree on the meaning of "national objective," then we could always go to court to have the matter settled. Resorting to the judicial system to resolve issues that are, at least at the moment, some kind of guarantee for Canadians is an inappropriate way to ensure that health services are available to all Canadians.

Our third concern relates to the opting-out consequences. The opting-out consequences endanger the universality of the health care system not only for future programs but for existing programs.

We all know that our present system of health care is very good. It has been identified by many other countries as a very successful program. We spend a relatively low proportion of our gross national product on health care and yet our outcomes are very positive. Our program is for all Canadians, regardless of their age, their disease or the thickness of their wallet.

We know that this system will need to be reformed in the future. In fact, if we do not start reinforcing the various parts of the system, it will be in danger of collapsing, because, first, there is financial pressure on the amount of the tax dollar that we will pay, and it will not be very elastic; second, the demographics of this country are of grave concern; third, advances in technology are having an impact on the taxpayer; and, fourth, there has been an increase of knowledge in all fields of health, all of which results in the need for reform, such as transferring some of the services to community-based services, and not guaranteeing only the most expensive part of the health care system, which is the hospital insurance and the cost of physicians.

If you do not already have universality in new programs and you cannot implement them, how will you transfer some of your actual services in new programs? You will then put portability in danger. Canadians will not be able to travel across the country and receive identical services. You will put in danger the universality of programs, accessibility, and so on. This is a very serious situation, Mr. Chairman.

We believe that provincial governments do not have the interest of the country as a whole at heart when they become involved in the development of health care. We believe that they have provincial interests at heart. As you know, before the 1950s each province developed its own health care system. They did not manage to provide care for all Canadians.

During the 1950s and 1960s, through a national effort, with strong national leadership it was possible to provide a health care system that has become the envy of many countries. We believe that, if we do not have a strong national presence, we will not be able to sustain the health care system.

You were all involved in the Canada Health Act, since you voted for it unanimously. You know very well that, if we had left the destiny of the health care system—specifically the definition of accessibility—to the provinces, extra billing and user fees would have removed accessibility for many Canadians. It was because of strong national legislation that it was possible to curtail this movement of the provinces. In fact, the provinces had three years to comply with the national legislation, which they did, and today, in acute care, you do not have user fees or extra billing.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that makes the point that strong national legislation in health care is important. You voted unanimously to protect the five principles of the Canada Health Act. Now, any vote on the accord, as it relates to clause 106A, would, in the medium and long term, endanger that health care system and the maintenance of the five principles. We would urge you, before you vote, to consider the concerns of nurses, who form part of the health care system, and the concerns of taxpayers. We want you to consider the public view of the health care system, which is that it is the number-one valued public service in this country.

We believe that the Government of Canada should ensure that the principles and standards of the national health care system are not lost through unilateral provincial action made possible—indeed, encouraged—by the accord.

Having said all this, we should, in all fairness, offer some suggestions in terms of what can be done if we support the Meech Lake Accord in principle but wish to see clause 106A changed.

The first suggestion is that life would be much better if there were no opting out of shared-cost programs, but I believe no one will accept that. The second suggestion, therefore, is that we believe that a national program should not be based merely on a broad interpretation of a national objective but should involve specific standards relating to a specific program that the federal government wants to put in place. Our third suggestion is that you may want to consider exclusion of the health care system from clause 106A.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you. I have on my list Senator Frith, followed by Senator Argue.

[Translation]

Mrs. Rodger, I wonder if I could ask you for some clarification. In your brief you say that you are a federation of 11 territorial and provincial associations. Since there are twelve in this country, could you tell us which one is not represented?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, at the end of 1985, l'Ordre des infirmières et des infirmiers du Québec left the national association.

Our position on the Canadian health care system was adopted unanimously in 1983, 1984 and 1985 when the Ordre des infirmières et des infirmiers du Québec was still part of the Association. In fact, we also have nurses from Quebec among our 100,000 members, even if the Ordre itself is not represented.

The Chairman: Thank you. I shall now yield the floor to Senator Frith, followed by Senator Argue.

Senator Frith: Mrs. Rodger, if I understand correctly, your concern is with the relationship between the Meech-Lake Accord and, I quote:

the future of Canada's health care system.

Generally speaking, that is your concern?

Mrs. Rodger: That is correct.

Senator Frith: You realize that eventually we will have to make recommendations about adopting the Accord or suggest amendments, and it is our job to decide how the amendments, if any, are worded.

Do you think we can do some repairs, in other words make some changes, or would we have to delete altogether those aspects of the Accord that may be a threat to the future of Canada's health care system?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, it would be perfect if we could delete those sections of the Accord that may be a threat to our health system. While making our suggestions we are very much aware that there is a political will to sign the Accord with as few changes as possible. Politically speaking, it may not be very realistic of us to ask for these sections to be deleted altogether.

That is why we feel that as far as section 106A is concerned, if the political will I mentioned remains the same . . .

Senator Frith: Excuse me, what was the number?

Mrs. Rodger: Section 106A, which refers to spending powers.

Looking at this section, what we suggest as an alternative is that instead of saying: provided the province develops a program compatible with national objectives, we say that the program must be compatible with national objectives and also include such standards or criteria as the program must meet.

At the present time, the interpretation given by certain provincial spokesmen is that moneys earmarked for health care could be used to finance entirely different sectors. Similarly, funds earmarked for one health sector could be spent on another health sector, and it could then be said that generally speaking this would be compatible with national objectives.

That is why we think it may be easier to introduce an amendment prescribing further clarification in the form of standards and criteria, a little like the Canada Health Act is doing now. Where the Canada Health Act refers to comprehensiveness as one of the principles to be observed, it defines what comprehensiveness is. It says that the term covers care that is medically required and provided in certain circumstances, and so forth. Every province must abide by this principle.

Such an amendment might help the health system as a whole, and probably other systems as well. But as you know ours is a nursing association and our mandate relates specifically to health, not to the political aspect of the issue.

Senator Frith: In your opinion, does the word "compatible" have roughly the same meaning in both French and English? In English something may be "compatible" without being concordant or the opposite of something.

Can we improve the provisions with a concordant word which fully and specifically respects instead of using the word "compatible"?

Mrs. Rodger: It is certain that the expression "which specifically respects" is probably more accurate than "compatible", which might be interpreted as meaning "not being opposed to".

But we do not think that making this correction would settle the debate on the national objectives.

Senator Frith: So there!

Mrs. Rodger: The government may have several objectives at a given time. So to the extent that it is compatible with the national objectives—if there are several and the plural is used—that might mean an objective in an altogether different field.

I think it is important as well to tighten up the definition of "national objectives".

Senator Frith: Could we take another word instead of "objectives", for example?

Mrs. Rodger: We believe that "criteria" and "standards" are much more precise terms.

Senator Frith: "Standards" is certainly more precise than the word "objectives".

Mrs. Rodger: Yes, they relate to the national program.

Then there is much less leeway. We would not end up having health funds diverted to highway construction in Canada.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

• (1600)

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. Next on my list is Senator Argue, followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Argue: I would like to ask the witness for clarification on how the national association deals, for example, with the nurses in Alberta, who I do not believe are part of a national union. Are they still members of your association and in what way do you speak for them?

Mrs. Rodger: The Canadian Nurses Association, as a registering body, deals, for the most part, with the protection of the public and the standards of practice. We develop exams for all student nurses so that they can become registered nurses, and then we develop standards. Our whole orientation relates to the practice of the profession. To be registered, all nurses must pass an exam and become members of their provincial organization, then the national and the international organization. The nurses' unions vary in each province in size and number, and their mandate is the protection of the nurse, which involves salaries and working conditions. In Alberta, for example, there were two different unions. Our association does not relate directly with the nurses' union, even though there is liaison and discussion between the two. In the recent Alberta strike, for example, the big concerns were: What are the consequences for nursing in Canada and what are the consequences, in general, of a strike like this on the health care system and the future of the profession? All of the nurses in Canada that are registered are then members of the Canadian Nurses Association.

Senator Argue: If the nurses association in Alberta felt that under the circumstances existing before the strike they were overworked and that the health care system was not as good as it should be, would you be apprised of that situation and would you have anything to say about it, or is that outside your jurisdiction?

Mrs. Rodger: The national association has the same relationship with the provincial associations as the federal government has with the provincial governments. We would intervene in a provincial situation if the provincial association wanted us to support it in that circumstance. What we do is provide a national standard in terms of what is expected for practice, and nurses use that to make sure that they evaluate their position in light of the standard and then take the necessary action to try to address issues or situations. It is from that point of view that we interface.

Senator Argue: I am sure that we were all interested in what you said about the health care system in terms of the value in keeping it universal, but there are other joint programs in Canada which, although they do not have a direct bearing on the health of Canadians, certainly have an important indirect bearing upon it. I have in mind such things as old age pensions, unemployment insurance—although that is basically a federal program—family allowance, and perhaps day care as a future issue. Do you feel that the proposed Meech Lake Accord has the same risks in store for these other shared or joint programs I have mentioned? Do you think the same risk applies to the favourable delivery of those programs as you say applies to the health care system? Do you think it will have a much broader effect on them than it will on health care, keeping in mind that health care is important?

Mrs. Rodger: I believe that is a broader issue than health care, but, as senators know from section 106A, the programs that are in existence are not affected by Meech Lake. It is not the programs as they exist now that will be endangered, unless the particular area they deal with needs reform. If, for example, we ever needed to reform the unemployment insurance program to establish guaranteed revenue, or whatever, the new program would be in danger.

It is our belief that the social programs we have in place are very much modelled on what we knew to exist in the fifties and the sixties. We have been living in the seventies, and the eighties are now challenging many of those values, because our resources are limited. They are forcing us to make new choices, to look at new alternatives. When one starts looking at new alternatives for shifting the old programs into new programs that are more appropriate to today's demands, one is talking of new legislation. So the whole possibility of shifting the old programs into new programs to meet the needs of Canadians in the future is endangered by section 106A. Of course, our mandate is to speak about health care.

Senator Argue: You made some reference, I believe, to the nurses association of Quebec not being at this time part of your association. Do you have any idea what their present stand is with regard to the Meech Lake Accord and do you think that they support in general the proposition that you have put before us today?

Mrs. Rodger: We have not discussed the Meech Lake Accord with the Order of Nurses, so I do not know their stance on it. The nurses from Quebec who are members of the Canadian Nurses Association do, as do the members in general, support the approach in the Meech Lake Accord. In fact, it was at the request of our associations that we wrote to the premiers of the provinces and to the Prime Minister to put forward our position on this subject. Therefore, even though we have not discussed with the Order of Nurses in Quebec their position on the Meech Lake Accord, I can say, as I mentioned before, that our position on the entire health care system is not a new one. It dates back to 1980. It was reiterated before the Macdonald Commission and before the committee studying established programs financing, to which we presented a brief on the transfer of payments with regard to the Canada Health Act. We are the only group of health professionals to retain a unanimous position in relation to our concerns about the health care system. All the briefs presented to those committees were unanimously accepted by the OEQ as a member of the CNA. I would have to check events of recent years to see whether there has been any change in their beliefs.

The beliefs I am talking about are fundamental to nurses as professionals, and that is why we can present a united position when other health care groups cannot. Other groups may be torn between the provincial government, which pays their wages, and the federal government. Nurses have retained their stance throughout; namely, that universality is necessary to ensure health care to all the people of this country. This cannot be accomplished with a collection of ten provinces, but only with a united country.

Senator Argue: You have presented a strong brief and you have made a strong presentation. Is it your feeling that the amendments are so desirable that, even though you support some major aspects of the accord, you would prefer to have no accord? Would you prefer to have it go through as is, if your proposed amendments are refused, or are you so strongly in favour of your proposed amendments that you think that without them the Meech Lake Accord should not be put in place?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, it is our belief that, if the cost of the Meech Lake Accord is to dismantle the Canadian health care system, the price is too high. Is that clear?

Senator Frith: That is very clear.

Senator Marsden: I would like to thank the witnesses for bringing forward a very important point which we have not discussed in this committee before, that of the health care system. In your response to Senator Argue a few moments ago you talked about the inevitability of new programs in health care and the impossibility of having universal health care programs under these arrangements. With respect to rights under the Charter and other aspects of the accord, we have heard considerable evidence that it was a deliberate decision on the part of some of the premiers to make, for example, the distinct society provision override the Charter of Rights, and so on. You have had discussions with ministers of health and premiers. Have you any reason to believe that section 106A is anything other than a deliberate attempt to move the country away from universal programs such as health care programs?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult for us to say whether or not this is a deliberate attempt to move away from universality. Certainly it is a possible consequence. When we put to the health ministers the consequences of this measure on the health care system, once they had given us the party line, they indicated that they were very pensive as to the real consequences of the proposal. They would say that we were right to be worried. But, whether it is deliberate or not, it is not for us to judge the intent. I believe that people are now conscious of these consequences. The question is whether or not there is enough will to repair the accord before it is too late.

Senator Marsden: I would like to ask you as well if you are following closely the child-care discussions that are now under way between the provinces and the federal government and whether, even though the minister has said that this matter is not part of the Meech Lake agreement, you see the discussions as a pattern of what would occur if the Meech Lake Accord were ratified?

Mrs. Rodger: There is a lot of speculation on the effect of the Meech Lake Accord on various issues. You have mentioned child care; abortion is another. I believe that, even though there may not be a formal change to the Meech Lake Accord, we have been influenced by the spirit of the accord. Because of that people are very nervous about making decisions to bring in strong national programs when they know that around the corner they may be able to get out of them one way or another. I do not know for certain, but I believe that there is this attitude, even though the accord is not law yet.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Good afternoon Madam and thank you for a very eloquent testimony. You suggested it would be possible for provinces to transfer funds from the health care system to other programs. Could you elaborate in the light of the Meech Lake Agreement?

Mrs. Rodger: First, concerning Section 106A's interpretation, the immediate explanation we had on national programs referred to the possibility of having a series of services that would be different or dissimilar from one province to the other.

I gave the following example: Say the Canadian Government decided to offer a primary health system, as it agreed to do with the World Health Organization, as a strategy to meet the future needs of the population, by ensuring blocks as for instance the whole series of home care for senior citizens; our interpretation of section 106A would be confirmed. A province could say: That is of no interest to us because we would rather use the money to develop clinics for mothers. Therefore, that province would not have home care for senior citizens, but would provide clinics for mothers by claiming that overall that health service meets national objectives.

Senator Gigantès: Compatible?

Mrs. Rodger: Yes, non-conflicting. That was one of the interpretations, which means that each of the services in the provinces would become different. Universality of services would no longer be assured because senior citizens in Prince Edward Island, for instance, would not necessarily enjoy the home services that would be provided in Ontario, say.

So there would be no universality and portability, and this would imperil in our national program the services provided to all Canadians.

Another interpretation did not come from us, but it put up more important red lights. For instance, representatives from the provinces publicly stated they could use health moneys to improve their roads.

Senator Gigantès: Do you have examples?

Mrs. Rodger: Yes, representatives from Quebec mentioned that on TV.

Senator Gigantès: Money provided by the federal government for health purposes.

Mrs. Rodger: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: And it was used to pave roads.

Mrs. Rodger: Not money which has been used, but which might—

Senator Gigantès: Which might be used.

Mrs. Rodger: Yes. This comes under clause 106 A, which states that it might be used for programs which are compatible with national objectives. Since the national objectives are so vaguely defined, there could be quite a lot of them.

Senator Gigantès: I see.

Mrs. Rodger: This means that the moneys received by provincial governments could be used for other programs inasmuch as these are compatible with national objectives.

Senator Gigantès: These moneys could be used for prisons or for anything else.

Mrs. Rodger: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: This is quite interesting!

Mrs. Rodger: Yes. These are some of the concerns we have, and, as you know, the national health care sets minimum criteria to provide hospital and medical care.

It is certain that not all services will be assured under a future health care system. Choices will have to be made in relation to available resources and whatever national services might be needed in view of demographic and other changes.

Senator Gigantès: Have you read recently the book published by the Fraser Institute in Vancouver, which is probably the most monetarist, the most rightist and the most deficit conscious of all the institutes that carry out economic studies? This report is entitled "Caring for Profits" and it says that, of all the health care systems in the world, the Canadian system is the only one to meet the contradictory requirements of consumer needs and the need to compress expenditures. It also quotes figures showing that the costs of the Canadian system have not increased as a proportion of the gross national product and points out that Canada is the only country where this is the case. Have you read this book?

Mrs. Rodger: I have not read the study published by the Fraser Institute, but we are very familiar with this way of thinking. We have carried out many studies with our own economists. I gave a lecture last summer at the Financial Post Conference on privatization of the Canadian health care system and on the future options, availability and quality of health care.

I can tell you that we now spend about 8.6 per cent of the gross national product to provide hospital care and medical services for all Canadians.

Our American neighbors spend over 10.6 per cent of their own gross national product to provide care to only part of their population, of which one third is uninsured.

[Mrs. Rodger.]

The position of the Canadian Nurses Association as concerns the financing of the health care system is this: We have asked the legislators not to put any more money than there already is into the health care system, and this is still our position. We ask them to maintain the same ratio between the gross national product and health care expenditures, but to put these resources to better use within the health care system.

We are now using parts of the system which are very costly. We are spending public funds on these services when we could be using other parts of the system which are more effective, provide better care for the public and are less costly. This is why our position on the Meech Lake Accord is so important because it is based on a reform using available resources. If you take away the possibility of changing and redirecting the program nationally, the die is cast. The system cannot sustain such pressure.

Senator Gigantès: As soon as there is an attempt to change the system, ways will be found to avoid it and people will be able to say that their expenditures are compatible with national objectives, even though they are not necessarily in the field of health care. This is what you are saying.

Mrs. Rodger: Exactly.

● (1620)

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Gigantès. Next is Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The witness is so clear, succinct and well-informed that I cannot resist the temptation to seek guidance on two points.

I understand that your proposal is that section 106A should be amended so as to provide for opting out if a province carries on a program or an initiative that conforms to standards and criteria established by the Government of Canada.

Senator Frith: Conforms?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): This assumes that the Government of Canada has the right to establish the standards and criteria. I want to ask you if you are familiar with a 1984 dictum of the Honourable Terence Donahoe, now the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, that national purposes in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction—he was speaking of education—are to be defined not by the Parliament or the Government of Canada but by the provincial governments, to whom, under the Constitution of Canada, those matters are assigned. Is his position correct?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, if you wanted to explore the discussion or the debate on the constitutional powers between the federal government and the provincial governments, it would be totally out of my field, because I am not a constitutional lawyer. However, even though we do not become involved in an issue such as that without getting advice from all sides—economists, constitutional lawyers, or whatever—my lay understanding, or my understanding as a private Canadian citizen, is that, if you stand on the letter of the Constitution, the Government of Canada can only collect money and pay, and the provinces can provide, administer and perform all of the services. That is standing on the letter.

The reality, though, in this country is very different from that. In fact, I had a discussion with a minister of health who took somewhat that same approach, of standing on the letter of the Constitution, with the provincial governments gaining power. However, he was not ready to go to the public and tell them that they did not have a national health care system, because the fact is that they do have a national health care system. It emerged from the blend and the experience of Canadian society that, in fact, the only way in which we could assure health care for this country was to band together and implement it.

In fact, the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons says that, if we go back with section 106A whereby every province stands on its constitutional rights and does its own thing, we may end up with a chequerboard of social programs in Canada, and that should be encouraged. Mr. Chairman, we beg to differ with that. We believe that our constitutional experience as Canadians is different from that, because, in fact, we would not be serving the Canadian population if we merely stood on the letter of the law relating to a health care system.

I do not know if my colleague wishes to add anything.

Mr. Michel Simard, Public and Government Relations Manager, Canadian Nurses Association: I think there are as many political and judicial interpretations of this matter as we have visions of Canada in this country. Senator, you have just quoted the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. In fact, the Liberal Party of Quebec, in its document of 1985 entitled "Master our Future", quoted the Canadian Health Act as an example of something they wanted to deal with in a more proper, constitutional way.

I think it is a matter of fact that for years the provinces of this country have wanted to gain more power and that the federal government has been there as a body to share resources between poor and rich provinces.

Perhaps the only thing we must remember is that, once we get out of something at the federal level, it then becomes quite difficult to have a say in the matter. I personally think we should remember that Canadians as individuals want to have the same opportunities, the same approaches and the same programs throughout the country.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, that leads me to my next question. I take it that the Canadian Nurses Association is firmly of the view that the program or initiative should be one that would conform to standards and criteria established by either Parliament or the Government of Canada. We are dealing here with health care, a matter normally within provincial jurisdiction, but it has been said by these witnesses that what they are asserting in relation to health care would be equally true in other areas. That was said in response to Senator Argue's question. How is that view compatible, if I may use that term, with the proposal in this constitutional amendment that Quebec is to be treated as a distinct society within Canada?

Surely, if Quebec is a distinct society, that establishes a basic right for Quebec to have a health program and other comparable programs appropriate to the nature of that distinct society. Are you not, by implication, attacking the concept of Quebec as a distinct society?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, we were not attacking that concept, although perhaps we should be.

We do have a reality in this country. We have created a service and a level of health care for all Canadians which is minimal. This is the reality within the Constitution, and the reality of the Constitution has lived through the years.

As I understand it, the Constitution is a guarantee for Canadians to be protected against a majority government. The Constitution is to protect me, the citizen. When politicians start playing with the constitutional reality or the law of it, then my protection against a majority government is threatened. In this instance the Meech Lake Accord, by article 106A, is playing with the constitutional balance within this country, and even though I am not a constitutional expert or a lawyer I think that endangers the health care system of Canadians. That is the bottom line.

For example, one province might say that it has money, or it has this or that, and does not want to be a party to this, but would like to do its own thing; well, if that was the attitude of this country, there would be a large group of Canadians who would still not have access to health care today, or who would have access to a system, but there would be one system for the rich and one system for the poor.

I do not think Canadians want that, and Canadian nurses do not want that. We remember what it was like before the 1950s and we saw what that did to Canadians. We do not want that to happen again. If there is another part of the accord that might touch on that, you had better look at it. It is not our role, but you had better look at it, because it is serious. We will be paying for that down the road. It is not just something that will go through the books, because, when the health care system is out, we will be in asking for care. We had better think about this twice, because it is very serious for this country.

[Translation]

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mrs. Rodger, I listened with a great deal of interest to what you had to say, and I was particularly moved by your concluding statement, because I am old enough to remember that in the fifties a person had to mortgage his house if he happened to need expensive treatment. It was a pleasure to hear you defending the health care system the way you did. In any case, we never doubted we had the support of Canada's nurses.

However, I do have two questions. The legislation introduced by Ms. Monique Bégin was universally accepted because the Canadian people wanted this legislation, as was shown in a Gallup poll. Do you think this kind of legislation will be possible once the Meech Lake Accord is adopted?

Mrs. Rodger: I will ask Mr. Simard to reply.

Mr. Simard: The answer I am about to give was in fact examined by the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on this subject, and I would like to quote paragraph 34 at page 77 of the Committee's report:

[English]

We are agreed that the phrase "the national objective" does not equate with national standards. Given the language of proposed section 95B(2), it would be impossible to equate objectives with standards. Nor can it be said that "the national objectives" can be equated with conditions or criteria, as exemplified by the Canada Health Act.

[Translation]

One could establish the general purpose of the Canada Health Act, but the criteria of universality, portability and public administration could not be included as such in a federal act.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): That may be a reflection on the value of this report. This particular quote aside, what was said in the report is not reflected in the recommendations and amendments. I find that very revealing. Well, at least we will have the Senate's report, which I hope will be more lucid.

To get back to the expression "compatibility", are you telling me that moneys earmarked for health programs could be used to build roads? We have seen, in the case of universities, that the provinces have withdrawn from joint programs. They continue to accept the federal contribution but have reduced their own, even in the richer provinces. Do you think we could justify spending moneys earmarked for health care on building airports that would be used by an air ambulance service?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, I think that interpretation is correct, but we did not suggest it. We heard what the signers of the Accord and the representatives had to say, and they gave these examples. At that point we became even more concerned than we already were. So, yes, it would seem that given the present wording that is a possibility, and I know that some of the signers of the Accord thought so.

People will say that if we cannot agree on the interpretation, when it comes to the crunch, we can go through the judicial process and ask the courts to settle the problem. Well, this is no way to guarantee health care for Canadians, if we have to go before the courts to find out whether a given term means this or that.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Thank you for answering my question. I seem to recall that the courts seldom have judges who are familiar with health care and medical matters. Thank you, Mrs. Rodger.

The Chairman: Thank you Senator LeBlanc. We have come to the end of our first list of speakers. Since we have some time left, Senator Frith, who is first on the second list, may proceed with his question.

[English]

Senator Frith: There is a word that appears in section 106A that I have found most people skip over. I am looking at Professor Hogg's book entitled Meech Lake Constitutional Accord Annotated. He devotes a chapter to article 106A in which he talks about compatibility, but does not mention this word. It states, as you have pointed out:

• (1640)

Section 106A requires reasonable compensation to be paid to a province that "carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives".

I think it is a reasonable rule of interpretation, and nothing particularly esoteric, to assume that if you are using another word besides the word "program" you mean that word to have a different meaning from "program." That means that reasonable compensation could be paid to a province that carried on not just a program but an initiative.

What, in your experience in this field, could be termed an "initiative"? Something less than a program, I would assume, and, if so, what? For example, would it be just a statement of intent or something like that?

Mrs. Rodger: I know—and we have seen this over the years—that when departments of health decide which way they should go in terms of health care—and I am sure that this is true for other departments, although my experience is more with health care—they say, "We should be doing this new thing. We should be redirecting in this way."

In Montreal, because of some of the research that was undertaken, it was felt that nurses should be a point of entry into the health care system instead of doctors. Currently a person needs a doctor's signature to enter the health care system and a doctor's signature to get out of the health care system, unless that person dies, thereby getting himself out. There is a gate-keeper notion, with the physician being the gate keeper, and the law is structured around that concept. However, much of that research showed that nurses, because they are generalists, can care for a population at much less expense and still provide a broad, general type of service. The patient is referred to a physician only if there is need for diagnosis and treatment.

To institute a project like that a program would not be appropriate. So when they have difficulties with the notion of what is or is not possible to do, governments undertake demonstration projects and, in that spirit, try to determine what should be done for the future. But they are politically sensitive, and after a demonstration project has been lived with for three or four years, and the money runs out, everything is put back on the shelf, because, even though it may be the best way to provide a service, it is politically difficult to implement.

Those types of pilot projects or administration projects could come under the word "initiative." It could be interpreted in another way, but that is one way I know departments of health like to use as a means of implementing projects.

Senator Frith: If a provincial government asked for reasonable compensation under 106A, the federal government would then say, "Show us your program that is compatible with national objectives." The province would then say, "We do not have a program, but we still want compensation." The province would then be asked what it was offering, and it would respond by saying, "We have an initiative." The federal government would ask what that was, and the province could simply say, "This is something we are thinking about undertaking."

[Mrs. Rodger.]

How much less than a "program" do you think it would have to be in order to obtain compensation under 106A? Quite a lot less?

Mrs. Rodger: I do not know what the intent was with respect to differences, but local initiatives, or whatever, were supported by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. It said that local experimentation and initiatives should be encouraged.

Under the system as it exists there is a place for local initiative and experimentation. There is nothing that precludes that now, and I do not see why it should be precluded in the future. I think that is part of the nature of the system we have given ourselves; but when we put this down as an alternative to a program that is universal, that is where the trouble starts.

Senator Frith: And entitlement to compensation under 106A.

Mrs. Rodger: Yes, and entitlement to compensation under 106A.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I now call upon Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, I will continue along the lines of the previous questions. Has the Canadian Nurses Association studied, for example, possible initiatives that would allow Canada to have in its national health system a nurse-practitioner initiative or system in order to lower the cost of health care services and make those services more universal?

Mrs. Rodger: Mr. Chairman, the whole notion of nurse-practitioner was the object of many economic studies undertaken in the 1970s. If that had been implemented, that would have saved a great deal of money. Something in the order of $800 million would have been saved if that model or a similar model had been implemented.

The Canadian Nurses Association has not been pushing for the nurse-practitioner concept, which is the situation in the United States, because that relates to an extension of medicine and to someone who helps with diagnosis and treatment. The health care system is now moving towards health for all in primary health care. We believe that a clinical nurse specialist with a Master's Degree is better prepared to take a broad approach and to act as the first line of entry to the health care system. In that regard the government has asked for demonstration projects. Well, we have been demonstrated to death. We have data to show that those alternatives are there, that they are scientifically valid in their results and impact on the population and on the cost of the health care system.

Demonstration projects only soothe the consciences of people who do not have the political will to do the right thing.

We are saying that now we do not need any more demonstration projects, but what we need is reform of the health care system and reallocation of the resources. That is why we do not fall into that trap. I do not think you should fall into that trap, either. That is a cop out.

Senator Haidasz: Does the Canadian Nurses Association blame any government or any health body for blocking the introduction of the nurse-practitioners concept in the health care system?

Mrs. Rodger: It is not the approach of the Canadian Nurses Association to blame anyone for social changes. We do not take that approach. We have defined the changes that need to take place, and we push everywhere at the same time.

The Canada Health Act is a good example. We brought forward an amendment to the Canada Health Act. We had the support of the three parties. We did that on the common-sense basis of what was needed for the future. That was proposed by the Conservatives and was supported by the Liberals and the NDP. There was an agreement between the parties to that amendment.

Our approach is to try to push politicians to see the importance of such amendments, and we also push our colleagues, the physicians and others involved in the health care system, to sensitize them and get them to help us.

If you ask what the major blocks are to the implementation of the nurse-practitioner concept, I will say that for evolution to take place, as it should in any reform, the major block to be removed is Meech Lake.

Senator Haidasz: Then perhaps section 106A should be struck down.

Mrs. Rodger: Or amended in a way that is specific and that meets national criteria and standards as they relate to that program and as established by the federal government.

Senator Haidasz: With the necessity of unanimous provincial agreement, do you think it is practical or possible?

Mrs. Rodger: For the total accord?

Senator Haidasz: Yes.

Mrs. Rodger: I think that it may be difficult, but I do not think that you should give up because it is difficult. If you give up, the consequences will be much worse than the political turmoil you will create now.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mrs. Rodger, you say—● (1650)

The Chairman: I am sorry, but we have exceeded the time, Senator Stewart. Is it a brief question?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes, very brief. It follows upon the last response.

You say that we should not give up. Does that mean that you have not given up and that you are making this case, the case that you made here this afternoon, to the Premier of Manitoba, for example, and the Premier of New Brunswick, for example?

Mrs. Rodger: In fact, Mr. Chairman, members of our association have already met with their premiers to brief them and support them in their opposition to some of the elements. Of course, the one that we are dealing with is health care. When I say, "We push everywhere," I mean it.

Senator Frith: Will you appear before any committees of legislatures too?

Mrs. Rodger: We have asked to appear everywhere nationally that there are committees. Provincially, the member associations are doing that. We believe that this whole issue of the consequences of 106A in the health care system is not understood by Canadians, because the whole process of Meech Lake has taken place quickly. Unless you are really alert to a system, then you do not realize the consequences. We think that if Canadians knew what you were doing they would be up in arms. By speaking more and more about it we hope that we will get the media—so far they have not been very cooperative, but we hope they will be—to air the problems and the consequences so that the public will start standing up about it. That is why we are here, and that is why our member associations are everywhere.

Senator Frith: Will you appear before the Ontario committee that is conducting hearings?

Mrs. Rodger: No, Mr. Chairman. The national association appears nationally, the provincial associations appear provincially. We are a federation.

Senator Frith: They will appear?

Mrs. Rodger: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Mrs. Rodger, Mr. Simard, I can only thank you for the brief you submitted earlier, and even more for the very lucid statement you gave us this afternoon.

Indeed the applause from my colleagues which interrupted your statement clearly indicates it was appreciated. I thank you very much.

Mrs. Rodger: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this concludes our hearings for today.

Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, March 9, 1988.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Royce Frith, deputy chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration presented the following report:

Thursday, March 3, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee is presently undertaking a review of the budgetary situation pertaining to Senate Committees.

Your Committee therefore recommends that, notwithstanding the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, for any committee budget for the financial year 1988-89 submitted to and approved by the Internal Economy Committee, your Committee be authorized to release no more than 3/12 of those approved funds until the end of June 1988.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

ORAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to present a brief, informal report from the Standing Rules and Orders Committee. The committee wishes to make a recommendation to the Senate regarding the seating in the galleries for the proceedings in Committee of the Whole on Wednesday, March 30.

A number of inquiries on the matter have been received by several senators, by my office, and by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. The committee examined that question this morning and suggests the following as the best solution. One pass for the North Gallery should be issued to each senator. Those seats would be reserved until 2:30 p.m., and if they were not occupied by that time others would be allowed to occupy them. The remainder of the seats in the galleries would be treated in the normal way; that is, on a first-come-first-served basis. Also, the possibility of televising the proceedings over the OASIS system should be discussed with the House of Commons broadcasting service to enable interested individuals to see and hear the proceedings in other parts of the building. Consideration should also be given to installing a screen in the Railway Committee Room in case there are not sufficient seats in our galleries.

Those are the proposals of the Rules Committee for that occasion.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (E) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (E) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1988 (Sessional Paper No. 332-718).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we support this motion, it being the usual motion, but can Senator Doody tell us the total amount of Supplementary Estimates (E) before we send them to committee, and whether there are only a few or many departments concerned? Some senators might want to have that drawn to their attention so that they can decide whether to attend the meetings of the Finance Committee if a particular item or the total amount interests them.

Senator Doody: Yes, honourable senators, I would be pleased to try to help. I received this document this morning, as other senators did, I am sure, and I have not yet had a chance to examine it in any detail. I think the total amount of the supplementary estimates is in excess of $1 billion. There are in excess of 50 headings here, ranging from the Department of Agriculture to the Western Diversification Office, with just about everything in between—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Governor General's Office; Parliament;

Secretary of State; Environment; Energy, Mines and Resources; Medical Research Council; National Archives, and so on. I am sure there will be ample opportunity for honourable senators who are interested to examine in detail any one of these headings or sub-headings when the the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance sits to examine these supplementary estimates. Witnesses will undoubtedly be called from the departments and from Treasury Board to explain the various items.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 15th March, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

● (1410)

With your permission, I should like to say a few words on this adjournment motion.

The fact that the Senate itself will not be sitting as a body in no way diminishes the extent or scope of the committee meetings that will be held next week. I know that Senator van Roggen, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, has meetings arranged for his committee to continue its study of the Free Trade Agreement.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will be meeting for two days on the Immigration Bills it has before it—Bill C-84 and Bill C-55. They are matters of ongoing importance, and we cannot deal with them here in the chamber until they have been dealt with in committee.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has a full day's meeting arranged to deal with Bill C-60, the Copyright Bill. This is also a bill of great importance which has to be dealt with in committee before it comes here.

The Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries is on the road. It will be holding meetings out of town next week.

I should like to emphasize that the legislative agenda in the chamber is rather sparse at this time, because, quite frankly, legislation has not come to us from the other place. In its absence, it is appropriate that the Senate not sit next week and that we apply ourselves to committee work.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE ARTHUR TREMBLAY

TRIBUTES ON RECEIPT OF ÉDOUARD-MONTPETIT MEDAL—TEXT OF ADDRESSES AT CEREMONY PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment to draw your attention, and I feel I should, since so far there has been no report in Hansard and there will not be unless I draw your attention to the ceremony that took place yesterday in the Hall of the Senate, when our colleague, Senator Arthur Tremblay, received the Édouard-Montpetit Medal.

All those present on this occasion realized the significance of the honour bestowed on our colleague and at the same time the importance of the career that deserved this recognition. It may not be the right time to make this suggestion, but I thought that Senator Tremblay's speech on this occasion, and perhaps the other speeches, including yours, Your Honour, could be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate. The official nature of this ceremony was underscored by the reception given by the Speaker and the fact that all members of the Senate were asked to attend. I just would like to see the tribute paid by his colleagues to Senator Tremblay included in the official report.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, suffice it to say that our sentiments are indeed those expressed by Senator Flynn.

Personally, I remember when I was a member of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission that Senator Tremblay's name was often mentioned in our discussions about the changes that had been proposed and that were being implemented in Quebec at the time.

I take great pleasure in saying, also on behalf of my colleagues in the Senate, that, as I said before, our sentiments are indeed those expressed by our colleague, Senator Flynn.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of addresses, see Appendix "A", p. 2820.)

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NEW BRUNSWICK

STATUS OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick has offered his resignation.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Not as far as I am aware, honourable senators.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS)—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-12, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Qualifications of Senators).—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this order stands in my name because I wanted to provide to senators—in particular, to our caucus—an opportunity to consider the ramifications of this bill. My own response to it is that the reason for it, as set out and explained by Senator Marchand, the sponsor of the bill, is well founded.

Senator Marchand has explained that the present constitutional provisions for the property qualifications of a proposed Canadian senator have unfair application to a native Indian senatorial candidate who owns no property outside a reservation. Senator Marchand explained that that is the motivation for the bill—the essential evil the bill is meant to cure.

In the course of the preparation of this bill his attention was directed to two other provisions in the Constitution that he felt had become somewhat archaic: the property qualifications for senators in general; and the requirement that a Quebec senator, to qualify for a particular division, must also have property in that division. Senator Marchand proposes that those two provisions also dealing with property qualifications of potential senators might well be eliminated from the Constitution, because, in his view, they have become obsolete.

It is my impression that all senators agree with the main purpose of the bill, which is to correct the unfairness of the property qualifications as they apply to senators nominated from our native population. There may be some reservations about the other two branches of the bill. So I think it would be appropriate to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, where we could hear further evidence on the subject and senators could ask questions. We shall then know whether we are satisfied with all three provisions, particularly the two Senator Marchand has added beyond that which forms the main purpose of the bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I suggest that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs invite a number of legal experts so that we could inquire about the constitutionality of this bill and find out whether we have the right to pass this kind of legislation.

Senator Frith: If the Senate will allow me, I just want to comment briefly on the point raised by Senator Denis.

According to one opinion, the amendments proposed in Bill S-12 are in order, as far as the Constitution is concerned, because the bill only amends the Constitution of Canada.

In any case, I feel that some clarification regarding this bill is in order.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, the point is to find out whether the bill is constitutional or not.

● (1420)

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Frith, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 2818)

TEXT OF THE ADDRESS OF THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE
AT THE PRESENTATION OF THE ÉDOUARD-MONTPETIT MEDAL
TO SENATOR ARTHUR TREMBLAY ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1988

[Translation]

The Speaker: Your Excellency, honourable colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Senate I am very pleased to welcome the members of the Édouard-Montpetit Foundation, all the more so because when one of our colleagues is honoured we usually attribute some of the merit to our institution. Such will not be the case today, however, because this is obviously recognition given to a strictly personal endeavour.

Still we are proud to join your Foundation to highlight this special occasion in the career of our colleague.

When Arthur Tremblay was appointed to the Senate he had already achieved success in the world of education at the highest levels of pedagogy, sociology and—more especially, as far as we are concerned—the realm of legislation. If I wanted to be more specific, I would add in federal-provincial arcana. The Senate therefore cannot claim to have made him even more famous. Rather, it is the other way around and I am pleased to admit that when he joined us the Senate was highly honoured.

Today your foundation is awarding Arthur Tremblay its grand prize for his exceptional contributions to so many of the fields opened up by that great innovator, Édouard Montpetit. Our colleague's intellectual activity did not slow down when he became a senator, and we are happy to have this opportunity to pay tribute to his whole-hearted collaboration in every area of our legislative work, whether social, economic, scientific or, most of all, constitutional. We can testify—and it is our great good fortune—that he bears this heavy load with ease.

Every time Arthur Tremblay takes the floor in the Senate all heads turn towards the professor, towards the academic, towards the professional of didactics who analyzes the question and who, with an eloquent voice and the expressive strength of his hands alternating to the right and to the left, shows you the two aspects of the problem and makes it easy for you to reach an enlightened decision.

Those of us who had the pleasure of attending the lectures of the great Édouard Montpetit have the impression that we are again listening to the great master who never raised his voice and who, to prove his point, would rely only on his own erudition. In his unfaltering delivery Senator Tremblay does not need to shout to make you understand reason. He explains his subject with supportive evidence in a way that challenges his listeners to dare raise an objection. Master of himself, master of his subject, master of his time, master par excellence, he does not need to seek virtuosity and, thanks to his intellectual empire, he gains our undivided attention.

In the shadow of Édouard Montpetit, a great many academics have sought to benefit from his name. Mere epigones they were. How refreshing it is this evening to salute, not necessarily one of his disciples but an authentic academic in the likeness of Édouard Montpetit. The Senate commends your Foundation for this official confirmation, and the Senate stands proud to have Arthur Tremblay as one of its own.

TEXT OF THE ADDRESS OF THE HONOURABLE ARTHUR TREMBLAY ON RECEIPT OF THE ÉDOUARD-MONTPETIT MEDAL

[Translation]

Honourable Arthur Tremblay: Ladies and Gentlemen, why should I not admit it right away, candidly and without false modesty? It is far from unpleasant to be awarded a medal as prestigious as the Édouard-Montpetit Foundation Medal and as the recipient of such an honour to be in the distinguished company of such people as Father Lévesque, Mrs. Lavoie-Roux and several others.

Not only is it not unpleasant, but it is even reassuring in a certain way to hear someone say that what you have tried to accomplish has had an impact on the development of your peers and that you have been able through your actions to be useful to those you had tried to serve.

Mr. President Legault, I am deeply touched that you and your Foundation colleagues have decided to award the Édouard-Montpetit medal to me. I thank you most sincerely. I thank also Mrs. Garcia and Mr. Pallascio.

We were taught in school that "The self is detestable". To talk about oneself is even more detestable. How can one avoid doing so however in circumstances such as these when one gets the very strong feeling that what people are praising you for would not have been possible and would not have occurred had it not been largely determined by the situations in which you found yourself and by those who placed you there?

Mr. Édouard Montpetit was certainly one of those leaders for several generations of young Canadians. I have never had the opportunity to meet him. But I feel as though I have always known him. He was already famous when I went to the Chicoutimi Seminary for the first time in the early 30's. Our teachers considered him, together with Abbé Groulx and a few others, as their mentor; he was also the mentor of our generation of students. For over 20 years at the "Nouvelle École des Hautes Études Commerciales", he taught economics at the university level. He was the first one to hold that chair. We can hardly realize today what a daring undertaking it was in 1910 to teach what he used to call "The science of wealth", at a time when Mgr Paquet and others used to proclaim that Providence had placed us on earth not to seek material goods but the true values of the soul and mind. He described later on the reactions which he had experienced in some quarters when he started teaching at HEC.

It was real chaos on the inspired Hill. To get rich, he would say, what a dangerous doctrine! Had we not always contrasted the wealth of others with our intelligence? To practical disciplines, opposed the higher subjects of Classicism?"

At this point, I would like to quote a well known economist, Professor Albert Faucher. In the conclusion of a substantial paper published in 1966 by McGill University Press as part of a series of lectures entitled "French Canadian Thinkers of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries", Professor Faucher had this to say:

"Édouard Montpetit won during his lifetime the reputation of a great scholar, an ardent patriot, and a brilliant writer and public speaker. His lifetime saw the heyday of clergy-ridden institutions in Quebec, and whatever Montpetit did in those days supports the view that he was the right man in the right place. To many of his students he was a friend and a guide, to all of them he reflected dignity and stood as a model of studiousness".

During the 1930s, the teachings of Montpetit and the existence of advanced business courses in universities were perhaps not as much of a novelty as 25 years before. For us students, they were part of the landscape of possible careers, a landscape with wider horizons than the traditional trilogy of priesthood, law and medicine. For us, at the time, they had a meaning which young people can hardly envision today, faced as they now are with a multitude of options. For us, it meant that, when the time came for our "vocation retreat", we would be able to reach outside the boundaries of the classic trilogy. Thus, in 1937, at the "selection of the ribbon" which then officially announced career choices, I pinned the advanced business courses ribbon on my uniform.

However, I was not absolutely certain of being able to reach my goal, as in 1937, the Saguenay region was still deep in the recession. The circumstances faced by many families made university studies extremely uncertain. Because of these conditions and of other events, my dream of an advanced business diploma was but a dream.

Then, in 1939, I was fortunate to meet Father Lévesque, who had just founded in Quebec City a new Social, Economic and Political Science School. For him, money was no problem or at least, one which was not impossible to overcome. The things that mattered were, first, motivation, a certain cast of mind, and a taste for adventure and risk, in other words, character traits which sometimes can be found among the well-off, but most often are found among those who have nothing to lose.

Thanks to Father Lévesque, material obstacles having been at least temporarily overcome through tenuous but acceptable arrangements, I found myself studying social sciences with the rest of the variegated set this new discipline attracted in its early days. The first groups of graduates were indeed a strange lot. It was a diversified lot because of its origins and background; it included people with surprisingly varied ideologies, but their proximity to each other left them completely undisturbed. Yet, this diversified set found its coherence and unity in a kind of common intuition that a new world was about to be born after the upheaval of the depression and that we had an opportunity to take part in the development of a new scheme of things.

I still believe today that those of my generation were indeed lucky to make our career choices at a time which may have been troubled and even dramatic because of the depression and the war, but which was a fascinating time in the history of Quebec and Canada, a time when many things had to change or be rearranged to allow the people of Quebec, to which I am attached by the deepest fibers of my being, to find the means for active survival and self-development.

At a time when so many things had to be reconsidered in Confederation as a whole, I might say that one of the co-chairman of the Royal Commission on Relations Between the Dominion and the Provinces, le notaire Sirois, was our professor of constitutional law, and he saw no problem in discussing at length in our presence the report which was in the process of being prepared.

On those projects which offered so many opportunities, what amazes me now is that I had the constant luck of finding myself in the immediate entourage of initiators and pioneers who took me as an associate at crucial moments, most often at the time the project started.

Such was the case at a career turning point that happened during the spring of 1941. This happened within a student movement of nationalist inspiration, the "Bloc universitaire". We came to the idea that vocational guidance was essential to our national future.

"Our small culture, as we wrote, has a human capital that is inferior to none for quality. The problem is to make full use of that capital by developing all its potential. This means first that each French-Canadian must be trained, educated, to the full development of his capacities; this means also, just as necessarily, that he must be oriented toward the social environment that is the most suited to his abilities".

Such was the idea, but it was only an idea. During the winter of 1940, we had no inkling of how to implement it. This led us to visit a Sulpician priest, Rev. Wilfrid Ethier, who had just established in Montreal the Institut canadien d'orientation professionnelle. One thing leading to another, I was invited by him to take part in the establishment of the Institut Laval d'Orientation.

Was it the presence of that institute within Laval University that determined the latter to create in 1943 a School of Pedagogy, thereby enlarging a course of studies that was already given at the Faculty of Literature? That is possible, if not probable. At any rate, I was to be given another chance to be associated with the director of the new school, one Rev. Alphonse-Marie Parent, who in the 60's chaired the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Education in the province of Quebec; the same man who ensured that the School of Pedagogy developed into the Faculty of Educational Sciences some twenty years after its inception.

The same kind of luck was to lead to another decisive meeting. During the hearings of the Royal Commission of Inquiry into Constitutional Issues headed by Mr. Justice Thomas Tremblay, from 1951 to 1956, and the numerous briefs that came out of those hearings, it so happened that Paul Gérin-Lajoie and I were called upon to work on the preparation of many of those briefs. A genuine mutual respect and a solid friendship came out of that cooperation, so that during the summer of 1960, when he became both Minister of Youth and Minister in charge of the Department of Education in the Lesage Government, he asked me to cooperate in the preparation of the 1961 legislation. That "Magna Carta of Education", as he referred to it, was the beginning of what was to become, thanks to the further work of the Parent Commission, an overall reform of the Quebec educational system.

A few years later, was opened the Office de planification et de développement under the direction of Mr. Marcel Masse, then Minister of State in the government of Mr. Jean-Jacques Bertrand. It was not a mere coincidence that at the same time at the federal level was set up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion initially headed by Jean Marchand. Both organizations were indeed called to co-operate to bring into line in Quebec the initiatives of both governments in the area of economic development. Once again, I was fortunate enough to be asked by the minister responsible to work in this new field where the federal-provincial dialogue was to have a role as significant as the setting up of instruments for a realistic planning of the Quebec Government initiatives.

Is it necessary for me to relate the process which from the OPDQ led me at the request of Premier Bourassa to the Department of Intergovernmental Affairs in the autumn of 1971? Suffice it to say that in the previous month of June, the constitutional conference of Victoria had failed. That failure was followed by a latency period of several years during which the resumption of talks on the patriation of the Constitution was out of question. However, in 1975, Prime Minister Trudeau took up the issue again. Now the Quebec premier and his colleagues from other provinces were quite in agreement to Canadianize the British North America Acts. They were hoping, however, to extend the operation to include amendments which they felt to be essential and necessary. Their federal vis-à-vis having agreed to those amendments on the condition that there be unanimous approval, the premiers undertook to obtain that required unanimity and succeeded on several significant points. The result being that the chairman of their conference, Premier Peter Lougheed, was in a position in October, 1976, to acquaint the Prime Minister of Canada with the consensus reached after protracted discussions. He met with refusal and Mr. Trudeau explained his decision in a long letter sent a few weeks later either in December of 1976 or January of 1977, if I am not mistaken.

In the meantime, a rather important change had occurred in Quebec: the Parti Québécois was in power following the election of November 15.

The matter remained in abeyance on the constitutional level until the election of a Progressive Conservative government in Ottawa. Following the initiative of Prime Minister Clark, a quite amazing thing happened, more amazing than anything that had happened to me before, something all the more unforeseeable since I had retired from the Quebec Civil Service two years previously.

Explaining to me that since coming into office his government had taken toward the provinces a stand totally different from that of the former government, aimed at détente instead of systematic confrontation, a stand which should however not prevent his government from developing its own project for renewal of the Canadian federation, Mr. Clark concluded by asking me if I would be prepared to come to the Senate and work on this project which should come out as a green paper. This is how I was again hired to work on the Constitutional project, this time as a non-elected Parliamentarian.

That project was to go through tribulations unexpected at the outset. As a result of developments you are aware of, the project was put aside, so to speak. And in this hiatus you know what happened. Prime Minister Trudeau did carry out his project of patriation of the Constitution, but he did achieve it in such a way that Quebec will be left out in the process. The situation thus created was clearly inadmissible and intolerable for Quebec and for the other partners in the Federation.

With the arrival of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, the dialogue was initiated on new bases as he had promised during the electoral campaign. Quebec consented to the re-opening of the constitutional debate and Premier Lévesque himself made public in a comprehensive document the stand he would take in the future negotiations.

Of course, the re-election of Premier Bourassa modified the specific terms under which Quebec agreed to normalize its situation in the Canadian constitutional order. The will to initiate the required amendment process will only be stronger and more realistic as a result, on both sides.

Against all the skeptics' and pessimists' predictions, Mr. Mulroney and provincial Premiers managed the feat of getting a consensus on a proposed new Constitutional Accord. The draft has already been adopted by the Commons and several provincial legislative assemblies. The National Assembly of Quebec was the first to do so. I am convinced the other provinces will approve it within the time desired, at least with no undue delay, however morose some prophet of past history might feel.

The mortgage that weighed on the future having thus been removed, normalcy having returned in that regard, it will now be possible, as provided for in the Meech Lake Accord, to extend the work for the Canadian Federation renewal to its full dimensions and scope.

Ladies and Gentlemen, reviewing, as I just did, the undertakings in which I have been involved since the early 1940s, how could I not be struck by the fact that, at all significant stages of my career, I have been invited to work on important projects by the very persons who were in charge and had the ultimate responsibility for the undertaking.

You will then understand that, since I have that opportunity today, I would like to pay tribute and express my deep appreciation to all those who, since the beginning, have called on me to contribute to a certain extent to the progress of the people of Quebec and of the Canadian people.

At least, that was my intention in sharing with you these memories.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my wife, our children, our grandchildren and other family members, on behalf of our friends among whom I find many who have also worked on the same projects, I thank you with all my heart for hosting this meeting. I am deeply grateful for this generous welcome and for your hospitality which I know, from personal and frequent experience, you customarily extend as part of your higher duties.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN-MAURICE SIMARD

DECISION TO SIT IN SENATE AS INDEPENDENT PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a short statement to make at this time. It is the first opportunity that I have had to so since I made a decision some 12 days ago.

Moreover, I advised the Clerk of the Senate of my decision on March 7 last after having discussed the matter with the Senate Leader, Honourable Lowell Murray, as well as the Leader of my party, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney.

My decision is as follows: From now on I will sit in this house as an Independent Progressive Conservative. The reason is that on March 2 last I accepted the invitation of the trustees of the only francophone newspaper in New Brunswick, Le Matin. I therefore accepted the position of president and general director.

I was about 16 or 17 years of age when my Independent Liberal member of Parliament invited me to visit the House of Commons and my involvement with politics has dated from that time. Very shortly afterwards, I decided to join the Progressive Conservative Party. It was then quite a challenge and quite an order for a francophone. We were told that francophones would be much more at ease within the Liberal Party.

Being a native of the Témiscouata in Quebec, I was not afraid of challenges and I was also a fan of the Honourable Jean-François Pouliot, former member of this house. I decided to take up that challenge.

This means that after some 40 years in the political arena, it is with much feeling and perhaps some misgivings that I have taken such a step. I think that I leave within my party and other political parties some friends whom I ask to continue to give me their support and their advice so that as president and executive director of Le Matin we will be in a better position to uphold the interests of the francophone community of New Brunswick which is the main objective of that provincial newspaper.

Therefore I will sit in the Senate as an Independent Progressive Conservative, and you can rest assured that I will attend the sittings of the Senate as often as possible. I know that from afar, with the assistance of the ministers and my colleagues in the Civil Service, I will moreover continue to be the spokesman for all francophone groups in New Brunswick who will entrust their problems and their suggestions to me and will ask me to look after their own issues.

Such is the statement that I wanted to make. Thank you.

NEWFOUNDLAND VETERANS

FORTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF MURMANSK CONVOYS—
TRIBUTE BY RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, last week, on March 10, I was privileged to participate in a unique ceremony in Newfoundland to mark an historic event that recognized the service and valour of Newfoundland veterans.

The ceremony was hosted by the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador with, as special guest, His Excellency Alexei Rodionov, Russian Ambassador to Canada, who made a special visit to our province to pay tribute to 32 gallant Newfoundland veterans of the Royal Navy and Merchant Navy who manned the escort vessels in the convoys to Murmansk during the Second World War. The ambassador presented medallions to the veterans to commemorate the forty-fifth anniversary of the Murmansk convoys.

Of all the military operations carried out by the Allies in World War II, few were as vital to the final victory, or perhaps as unheralded, as the Murmansk convoys. When Hitler decided against the invasion of Britain, he turned the full fury of his military might against Russia. Nazi armies penetrated deep into Russian territory and the whole world was moved by the heroic Russian resistance.

The Western Allies needed time to prepare for the Second Front, but realized that it was vital, if victory were to be achieved, to support Russia materially as well as morally. This was accomplished by the massive transportation of war materiel, foodstuffs and other supplies, mainly by British convoys, to the ports of Murmansk and Archangel. This was undoubtedly the most dangerous convoy route in the world, for in addition to contending with Nazi U-boats the convoys had to face vicious Arctic weather, German aircraft and surface vessels. Many hundreds of Canadians manned the escort vessels during this torturous operation and many made the supreme sacrifice.

It was this combination of Russian and Allied heroism that prevented Hitler from occupying all of Russia. If this occupation had occurred the outcome of the Second World War would have been much different.

Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to place on the record another significant contribution by Canadian veterans, and specifically in this case by Newfoundland veterans, to Canada's war effort.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of Professor Ross Lambertson and a group of students from Camosun College in Victoria, British Columbia. They are here under the auspices of the Canadian Rights and Liberties Federation and have spent a week in Ottawa studying Parliament, with special reference to human rights issues.

I was able to speak to the students this morning and can say that this is a very impressive and interesting group.

I should also like to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that these students raised the money to pay their own travel expenses.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 15, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, your Committee considered the matter of access to the Chamber for a vote. On two occasions it was brought to your Committee's attention that Senators had entered the Chamber while a vote was in progress.

During its examination, your Committee was informed that the practice of locking the doors to the Chamber during a vote had been discontinued due, in part, to the objections of some Senators.

Your Committee, after studying the matter, has concluded that this practice, which is described in Appendix I to the Rules of the Senate of Canada on page 70 thereof, should be re-established.

To avoid any misunderstanding with respect to the time at which the doors of the Chamber are to be locked, your Committee further recommends that in future, when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked."

The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 15, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, your Committee considered the procedure respecting the presentation of public petitions.

Your Committee notes that on a number of occasions during the current session, petitions and the names of the petitioners have been printed as appendices to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, a procedure that is inconsistent with established Senate practice.

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that in future, all public petitions and the names of the petitioners not be printed in the Debates of the Senate or in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Your Committee further recommends that the explanatory text under the heading "Presentation of Petitions", in Appendix I to the Rules of the Senate of Canada, on page 57 thereof, be amended to reflect the above recommendation by deleting the third paragraph thereof and substituting the following:

"A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read. The text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed in the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

A Senator presenting a petition for a private bill reads the heading and sends the petition to the Table. No action is taken at this time because in practice one sitting intervenes between the presentation and the reading of a petition."

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the eighteenth report of the Standing Committee on National Finance, concerning the examination of the expenditures set out in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1988.

I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this date and become part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 2836.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE TOMORROW

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at four thirty o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, 16th March, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, perhaps the honourable senator would explain why she is asking for leave for this committee to sit this afternoon and tomorrow afternoon. Tomorrow afternoon the Committee of the Whole will sit on the Meech Lake Accord. I am sure that she is aware of this fact and that certain senators place great emphasis on those hearings, and I would want all honourable senators to have the opportunity to be present for those discussions.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is now considering two bills, Bill C-84 and Bill C-55. We have been sitting extra long hours in an attempt to complete our hearings with respect to these bills. I realize that tomorrow is somewhat unusual in that the Committee of the Whole Senate is hearing testimony on the Meech Lake Accord, and I regret that I am asking for leave for my committee to sit at that time, but it is the only day that one of our legal witnesses can appear. We have been trying to arrange for this particular witness to appear for three weeks in order to complete our hearings on Bill C-84. It is for that reason that I have asked for permission to sit tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT—TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS—RESPONSIBILITY FOR SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATIONAL CHART

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, recently I received, as I am sure did all honourable senators, a copy of the annual report of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. The minister, the Honourable Robert de Cotret, in submitting the report, stated that the report reflects the departmental structure as of March 31, 1987, which is prior to the changes in the organization brought about by the establishment of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

I should like to ask a general question, and then a more specific one. I ask the general question in order to make the reading of this report somewhat more understandable.

What functions or structures that had previously been under the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion have now been transferred either to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Western Diversification Office or the new Department of Industry, Science and Technology? That is a general question which the minister may want to take as notice.

My second question relates to the province of Nova Scotia, which is referred to on page 27 of the report. The activities of DRIE are outlined under the heading "Industrial Development" and "Economic Co-ordination." Do I take it that these two functions—industrial development and economic coordination—are now totally under the responsibility of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and does that agency administer the ERDA agreements, the GDA agreement and all subsidiary agreements? I am not clear on that, and I would like to find out exactly what remains and what has gone to the new agency.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, to take the second question first, the answer generally is in the affirmative. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency administers just about all the ERDA agreements. I, as minister, have responsibility for all of the ERDA agreements and for what remains of the old GDA agreements in the Atlantic provinces. The Leader of the Opposition asks whether the activities of industrial development and economic coordination in the province of Nova Scotia, formerly assumed by DRIE, have now been entirely taken over by ACOA. The answer to that question is yes, with regard to economic coordination, and partly, with regard to industrial development.

The Leader of the Opposition will be aware of the fact that the Minister of DRIE remains responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation and for large sectoral projects in Nova Scotia, as elsewhere. Other than ERDA and GDA agreements that have been transferred from DRIE to ACOA, I should also mention the industrial incentives under IRDP, the Atlantic Enterprise Program, Enterprise Cape Breton, and the Small Businesses Loans Act as it operates in the Atlantic provinces. I believe that is quite an exhaustive list.

Senator MacEachen: I take it that the latter group of activities are now under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Senator Murray: Yes, they are under me, as minister responsible for ACOA. The arrangements that I am making are that they come under the umbrella of the agency.

Senator MacEachen: As I understand the minister, the ERDA and the GDA agreements are now under his administration.

● (1430)

Under the heading "Industrial Development" reference is made to a number of subsidiary agreements such as the Advanced Manufacturing Support Subsidiary Agreement, the Technology Transfer and Industrial Innovation Subsidiary Agreement, the Tourism Subsidiary Agreement and, indeed, the Sydney Steel Corporation Modernization Program Subsidiary Agreement.

Am I to take it that these remain with the Minister of DRIE, or do they also come under the responsibility of the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the first two mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, advanced manufacturing and technology and industrial innovation, formerly administered by DRIE, are now my responsibility. The tourism subagreement, which has, I think, about a year to go, remains with my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism; and the Sydney Steel Corporation agreement remains with the Minister of DRIE.

Senator MacEachen: Is there any rationale for this distribution of development activities? Does it arise from a friendly chat among ministers as to which agency would be most suited to their temperament?

Senator Frith: "One for you, one for me."

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I tried to explain a moment ago, the Minister of DRIE remains responsible for what might be called "industrial sector policy," and in that capacity he has retained responsibility for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which, as the house knows, operates the coal mines in Cape Breton—

Senator Frith: That requires a very special temperament.

Senator Murray: —and for the subsidiary agreement on Sysco modernization. These are regarded as sectoral activities.

My responsibility, as Minister of ACOA, is in the field of economic development, particularly as it relates to small- and medium-sized business.

Senator MacEachen: Including tourism?

Senator Murray: We have a Minister of State for Tourism and the arrangement we have made with regard to those ERDA subagreements is that they will remain with him. Indeed, I think it is fair to say that the greater part of his activity as a federal minister takes place in the context of those federal-provincial agreements right across the country.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the minister for the information.

Has there already been circulated an organizational chart which would lead us through this somewhat confusing mess of agencies and authorities? I wonder if it is possible to have, let us say, an "idiot's guide," which might help us understand all of this.

Senator Frith: Byzantium made easy!

Senator Murray: As always, I shall do my best to accommodate the members of the opposition.

MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

ELIMINATION OF MINORITY EQUITY INTERESTS—IMPACT OF ENHANCED CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Over a great many years there was a development of equity interests in the Canadian affiliates of multinational corporations. As I am sure honourable senators have noted, recently these are being extinguished in certain cases. I refer specifically to Nabisco, a very large multinational centred in the United States, and to Imperial Chemical—CIL, which is, of course, centred in the United Kingdom.

For many years people felt that it was necessary to have a Canadian presence and the Canadian point of view expressed in many of these companies. Has the government any policy in regard to the elimination of these minority equity interests in multinational corporations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask for a report from my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on this matter.

Senator Sinclair: When the trade issue was being considered, groups were set up in the private sector to study various aspects of the impact of enhanced trade bilaterally with the United States and its impact on various sectors. Did one of those sectors deal with the question of multinational corporations and minority interests?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think not. I think that among the SAGITs there was not one dealing specifically with the subject that the honourable senator raises, but I shall have to see whether that subject matter was part of the mandate of some other SAGIT.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the point that I am interested in, and I think other senators would be interested in also, is: Were the implications of an elimination of minority interests in multinational companies looked at in any way, because there seems to be some linkage between this and the possibility of an enhanced trading relationship with our American counterparts.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA—STATUS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could help us with some clarification of a great deal of speculation and anticipation in Alberta respecting an announcement about a major tar sands processing plant at or near Fort McMurray, Alberta.

There have been statements by the Minister of Energy in Alberta, Mr. Webber, for example, that it is imminent and that the federal government will announce its support and financial endorsement—whatever that means—for a plant that will create 15,000 new or additional jobs, mostly in Fort McMurray but in other parts of Alberta as well. Therefore, I ask whether he could help us to advise the people, so that they can make plans, as to whether this consideration of the plant is in an advanced stage now. If not, when can we expect an announcement from the federal government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, what information, if any, he is in a position to convey to Parliament on that subject at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE STUDY OF CONCERNS OF MILITARY FAMILIES—STATUS OF REPORT AND NATURE OF RECOMMENDATIONS—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I notified the office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate last week that I would ask once again the question that I have asked so many times before, namely, whether there is a report from the Minister of National Defence on his response to the study of the situation of spouses of members of the military. If there is no such response, when can we expect it?

Senator Frith: Hasn't there been a response? Shame!

Senator Marsden: The minister said about two months ago that we could have it in seven weeks.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am informed that that matter is still in the hands of my colleague, the Minister of National Defence. The best I can do today is to say that its release will not be long delayed, and I am assured that it is only a matter of weeks away.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers. I will follow the format that has been established in this place. I shall read the date and the name of the senator asking the question. If any honourable senator wishes me to read the answer, I will; otherwise, I will ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to the following questions.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGY

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 15, 1987, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding Reproductive Technology—Request for Appointment of Royal Commission—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

The recommendation from a number of women's organizations and researchers in Canada, that the Government appoint a royal commission to study the social implications of new reproductive technologies, is currently under consideration by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The issues raised by those making representations are complex and far-reaching and a recommendation to the government as to the appropriate response has not been made yet.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—APPOINTMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 3, 1988, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding National Defence—Canadian Armed Forces—Appointment of Senior Officers—Female Representation.

(The answer follows:)

No women officers were included on the recently announced promotions to the General officer rank level.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING

IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to questions raised in the Senate on February 10 and March 1, 1988, by the Honourable Jack Austin, regarding International Whaling—Imposition of Sanctions—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

No, Canada was not consulted by the United States on this matter. The sanctions taken by the United States relate to its domestic legislation—the Packwood-Magnuson Act—as a measure against Japan's alleged violation of the International Whaling Commission (IWC) moratorium on whaling. It is a bilateral issue between the United States and Japan. Consultation was not required nor expected as Canada is not a member of the IWC—Canada withdrew from the IWC in 1982 following a review of its whaling policy. Canada continues to support international cooperation for the conservation of the world's whale stocks. This objective, however, does not require Canadian participation in IWC.

On the question of Canadian support for the U.S. sanctions, as a non-commercial whaling nation, the Government believes it would be inappropriate for Canada to judge the actions of whaling nations and the decisions of the IWC.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS—REACTION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 1, 1988, by the Honourable Jeremiah Grafstein, regarding Foreign Affairs—Senegal—Presidential Election—Safety of Opposition Candidate—Attendance of Observers—Reaction of Progressive Conservative Party.

(The answer follows:)

Presidential elections were held in Senegal on February 28. The official results are as follows:

- a) Abdou Diouf—73.2%
- b) Abdoulaye Wade—25.8%
- c) Babacar Niang—0.75%

[Senator Doody.]

d) Landing Savene—0.25%

Legislative elections were also held on the same day, the official results are as follows:

- a) Parti Socialiste (President Diouf)—71.34%
- b) P.D.S. Party* (Maître Wade)—24.74%
- c) LD/MPT Party*—1.41%
- d) PLP Party*—1.18%

There are 17 political parties in Senegal and freedom of expression does exist. This situation in Senegal is quasi unique in Sub-Sahara Africa.

Observers generally agree that, with a few exceptions here and there, the elections unfolded in a fair, open, and democratic manner. Therefore, results can be accepted as legitimate.

Mr. Abdoulaye Wade, Leader of the P.D.S. Party, declared that he would form a parallel government if fraud was to modify the outcome of the elections. Soon after the results were unofficially announced, he said that he could not accept them because of widespread fraud (une fraude généralisée).

Violent troubles erupted in popular quarters of Dakar City and on the university campus. To establish law and order, a state of emergency and a night curfew were imposed.

Soon afterwards, Mr. Wade was detained by police for interrogation. The government asserted it was to determine the extent of his involvement in those violent demonstrations. In other words, he was questioned to determine whether or not his actions related to those of demonstrations which compromised the State security.

Our Embassy in Dakar reports that the main leaders of the P.D.S., according to unconfirmed sources, have been arrested too.

N.B. Situation as of March 8th, 1988.

REFUGEES

THAILAND—TURNING BACK OF BOATS—SAFETY OF PASSENGERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1988, by the Honourable Jeremiah Grafstein, regarding Refugees—Thailand—Turning Back of Boats—Safety of Passengers—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

Following reports early in February that several boats carrying vietnamese were pushed back to sea by Thai authorities, officials from the Canadian Embassy in Bangkok sought clarification. Royal Thai Government, as well as from the local office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees.

These inquiries revealed that three such incidents occurred. In one case, a boat was pushed back to sea but was allowed to land the following day with no evident injuries to passengers; in the second case, Thai authorities report that a boat was attacked by pirates who killed or wounded several people on board; and in a third case, Thai authorities acknowledged that a boat was towed back to international waters by order of Thai naval authorities. As a result of a Canadian initiative, officials from Canada and other interested countries visited the marine area where the push-offs occurred.

During discussions with Thai authorities and with others, the Canadian Government has expressed its deep regret at the loss of life that resulted from these incidents and conveyed its concerns to Thai officials for the safety of the passengers of such boats.

Canadian officials also reassured the Royal Thai Government of Canada's commitment to provide relief and resettlement assistance to countries of first asylum, such as Thailand, and to continue to work closely with them in seeking humane and durable solutions to the problem of Indochinese refugees.

The Canadian Government is equally concerned with what could be attempts by Thailand's neighbours to take advantage of its excellent reputation as a country of first asylum. The Government is investigating this aspect of the situation and, if necessary, will make appropriate representations.

PATENT ACT

On the Order—

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I listened to and read in the Debates of the Senate with all the attention you can imagine the remarks which Senator Bonnell made on March 1 concerning his Bill S-15.

He was prompted to introduce this bill after reading an article by Linda McQuaig which appeared in the January 22nd issue of the Globe and Mail entitled "Drug firms increase prices faster than inflation rate".

This article had already lead to a long series of questions from several Liberal senators to which Senator Murray, the Government Leader in the Senate, had replied clearly and wisely.

After quoting many excerpts from this article, Senator Bonnell stated:

• (1440)

[English]

With that as a background and because of the fact that I saw that the government was taking no action, I thought that I should do something to protect the consumers of this country. Therefore I introduced Bill S-15.

[Translation]

Since this Globe and Mail article was used as a preamble to this bill, I feel it would be useful to replace it in its context and then reply to the charge of alleged government inaction.

The day before this article appeared, Mr. Lawrence Archer, a spokesman for the Ontario Department of Health, revealed that—

[English]

1,099 drugs are more than 5 per cent costlier on this month's price list than they were last July.

[Translation]

The Ontario List referred to by Mr. Archer includes 2,473 drugs. So it is fair to conclude that 44 per cent increased more than 5 per cent, and to note that 56 per cent increased less than 5 per cent. That finding dedramatizes right away the problem.

We know that two associations share the drug market, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, which represents the innovative industry—patent drugs—and the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, which represents the generic industry, that of copied drugs. Both associations are involved in that list, but according to Senator Bonnell's comments, the innovative industry alone is being accused.

One report by Mr. Brian Bérubé, to which I added some information, published in The Medical Post of March 1st, 1988, shed some light on the background and the origins of the debate. In September 1987, the Ontario Department of Health asked drug manufacturers to submit by October 5, 1987—at that point Bill C-22 had not been enacted—prices applicable to the drug list to be published in January 1988. That list included drugs that are being reimbursed to social welfare recipients and senior citizens. The department indicated at that point that increases above the "health" component, being approximately 6 per cent of the annual consumer price index, would be subject to review and justification. In that list the Ontario Department of Health found that 1,099 drugs exceeded 5 per cent, of which some 200 exceeded 10 per cent. The Ontario government summoned representatives of both associations on January 18, and a few days later, without any further consultation, slapped a 5 per cent ceiling for increases.

A January 29 report by Peter Maser, a Southam News correspondent for Mediascan, supplied very interesting information:

[English]

Of the 1,099 drugs whose price increases exceeded 5 per cent, more than half, 55 per cent, were produced by generic companies, the self-proclaimed good guys during the debate on C-22. In the same batch of 1,099, the prices of 188 rose by 10 per cent and over. Once again, 55 per cent of them were produced by generic companies.

[Translation]

That information flies in the face of Senator Bonnell's suggestion that innovative companies—

[English]

—which are multinational companies based 85 per cent in the United States and 15 per cent in Europe and Japan.

[Translation]

These countries alone appeared to be responsible for price increases in excess of the Consumer Price Index.

Since we are talking about increases in the CPI, I looked up statistics provided by StasCan. The year 1981 being our reference year, and thus 100, we see that the index for overall spending on health care and drugs has annually exceeded the CPI. In six years the CPI rose from 100 to 138.2, the index for health care spending from 100 to 152, and the drug index from 100 to 173.1. Contrary to the claims of opponents of the Patent Act, these figures illustrate how ineffective competition by generic drugs alone has been in stabilizing drug prices.

This is confirmed by the following figures: the drug index exceeded the CPI by five points in 1982, 8.4 in 1983, 3.9 in 1984, 4.3 in 1985, 3.1 in 1986 and 10.2 in 1987. More eloquent than any speech, these figures support the raison d'être of the Prices Review Board now included in the legislation on drug patents.

We saw the substantial increase for 1987 which, I imagine, Senator Bonnell would like to blame on the government's failure to act. Personally, I see it as a consequence of the lengthy obstruction by Liberal senators of Bill C-22.

Need I remind you that the bill was tabled in the House of Commons on November 7, 1986, and received Royal Assent a year later on November 19, 1987?

During those 12 months, the bill was referred by members of the House of Commons to a legislative committee and by the Senate to two separate committees. These committees heard over 300 witnesses, examined briefs by about fifty Canadian organizations and submitted several dozen amendments. Among the amendments accepted by the government, one which was proposed by the Senate which insisted on maintaining the Consumer Price Index as a trigger mechanism for the examination of drug prices by the Prices Review Board, whose chairman, Dr. Harry Eastman, and vice-chairman Dr. Robert Goyer, were appointed on December 8 last year. A secretariat has been set up, staff has been hired, and regulations have been drafted and will be published very shortly. In these circumstances, there is no reason at all to accuse the government of failing to act.

Less than four months after the Patent Act was enacted and following reports of a problem involving the Government of Ontario and the drug manufacturers, Senator Bonnell, without waiting for a ruling by the Prices Review Board, tabled Bill

[Senator David.]

S-15 to amend that part of the Patent Act which concerns pharmaceutical products. To me such action is premature, hasty, irresponsible and unworthy of the Senate's reputation as a source of wisdom, reflection, maturity and perhaps even serenity.

Senator Bonnell's bill is simplistic in the extreme, since it restricts the role of the Prices Review Board to that of a computer. The bill may be summarized as follows: If since June 27, 1986, the price of a patented drug exceeds the Consumer Price Index, automatically the price is deemed to be excessive and must be reduced accordingly. The same procedure is applicable to any drug first sold after that date, on the anniversary of the introduction of the drug into Canada. Should the company refuse, it will lose market exclusivity for one or several products. I find it hard to believe that a physician and parliamentarian with Senator Bonnell's reputation could make this kind of simplistic and unbending recommendation, considering the democratic society and complex environment in which we live. Reducing the role of the Prices Review Board to that of a school prefect or a court of justice without due process of law is something I find incredible and even shocking. In our Canadian context and considering the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I think it is unfair and probably unconstitutional to impose sanctions on the accused without giving him a chance to explain and be heard. To deny the board discretionary power is an insult to the intelligence of its members.

To imagine a mathematical formula which could be equitable is sheer utopian nonsense. Simplicity is a human virtue which I admire. However, when it comes to the interpretation of social, political, economic, national and international affairs, reality is far from simple since it depends on so many complex and uncontrollable factors.

Since it allows only comparison with the general consumer price index to determine whether or not a drug price increase is excessive, Senator Bonnell's Bill S-15 is simply unrealistic and unacceptable. Of course I recognize that the possibility of excessive price increases exists. That is why I have always insisted on the role of the Drug Prices Review Board. Furthermore, a number of factors can fully justify an increase over and above that of the consumer price index, such as an increase in raw material costs, in transport costs, in exchange rates or inflation in the country of origin, in capital expenditures, in interest or mortgage rates. That is why the current legislation enables the board to undertake an overall study once the rate of price increase of a patented drug exceeds the consumer price index. Finally, I would add that the board even has the power under the current Act to launch a five year retroactive investigation on how the price of a patented drug has behaved, to declare the current price excessive and to impose whatever penalties are provided for under the Patent Act.

After presenting his bill, Senator Bonnell referred to a study by pharmacologists Andrew Musial and Jerry Taciuk to show strong drug price increases by five innovative companies, with one exception. This is what he stated:

● (1450)

All those drug companies that raised their drug prices after the Bill was passed had promised they would not raise those prices above the CPI.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, I was unable to obtain the original document, but I appreciate the courtesy of my honourable colleague in giving me a photocopy of the four pages from which he took this information. I simply wish to point out that these increases occurred between January 1987 and January 1988 and that they did not take place only after passage of the Patent Act on November 19, 1987. Nothing in the pages I read shows that—

[English]

—all those drug companies raised their drug prices after the Bill was passed.

[Translation]

I wanted to correct that statement.

All the other arguments raised by Senator Bonnell in defence of his bill have already been used ad nauseam in this chamber and in the Senate committees, namely the need to protect the sick, the invalid, the old, the handicapped, the unemployed, the poor, the widows and widowers and single parent families, the lust for profit and the greed of the multinationals which make their money in Canada and the send it abroad, the increase in taxes and insurance premiums that will result from higher of drug prices, as well as all the other arguments used by many of the organizations which objected to the Patent Act.

Honourable senators, my colleagues and myself are just as sensitive as Senator Bonnell and his own colleagues to the needs of the people, especially the poor. This is why I shall be as persistent, not to say as stubborn, as Senator Bonnell in tracing the evolution and the impact of the Patent Act. I cannot accept the notion that this recent piece of legislation should be amended before we have waited long enough to be able to make a documented judgment on its impact. This legislation is only three months old, and the major mechanism it provides, monitoring, control and sanctions, is not yet operational. After all, this act is not written on stone, and it provides for an official review in four years and for another one in ten years. We shall monitor the situation closely while giving the act that time to prove its usefulness. It seems to me we have to exercise a modicum of wisdom and care, and to remain patient, verbally restrained and watchfully serene.

Honourable senators, in view of the circumstances, I suggest that Bill S-15 be withdrawn so that we may spend our time, energy and resources to consider new legislation instead of amending, after hearing the same arguments we heard for an entire year, before the same people and probably the same committee, an act which has just been promulgated and a prices review board which is now ready to do its job.

I thank you for your kind attention.

[English]

Hon. Ian Sinclair: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator David: Certainly.

Senator Sinclair: You have said that the operating period was only our months. As I recollect, the bill's trigger date was some time in June of 1986.

Senator Thériault: June of 1986?

Senator Sinclair: Yes. That is more than four months.

Second, why do you feel that because the generic companies followed the lead, or concurrently took action along with the pharmaceutical companies under patent to raise their prices, that, in some way, justifies the action taken?

I should like to be clear on why you made those comments.

● (1500)

Senator David: Senator Sinclair, it seems to me that June of 1986 was the date by which the generic companies were no longer allowed to have generic products on the market. In other words, that was the date of protection set for innovative drugs. The law was passed and Royal Assent was given in this chamber in November 1987.

With respect to your second question, I did not quite understand it. However, what I tried to say is that, with respect to this price increase and the conflict with the Ontario government, we have studied an article which seems to me to be well documented, showing that 55 per cent of the increase on that list was due to generic drugs and not to innovative drugs. My point was, therefore, that this shows that both were responsible for the increase and not just one side, as seems to have been said in this place many times and also in the newspapers.

Senator Sinclair: I would say to the honourable senator that, as I understood it, it was the minister who made the commitment that drug prices would not increase more than the CPI. Second, it was the patent drug companies, the pharmaceuticals, who gave the commitment to the committee that that would be the maximum by which the drug prices would increase. Therefore, both the minister, Harvie Andre, on a number of occasions, and the pharmaceutical companies gave that commitment. However, I do not remember any commitment being made by the representatives of the generic companies when they appeared before our committee with respect to that issue.

Senator David: It seems to me that it would have been very difficult to make these assumptions before the law was passed. To me, the interpretation of that would be that there would be no increase over the CPI once this law is passed. In other words, this was not a retroactive affirmation.

It is clear that this business which is being written about in newspapers is really a problem between the Government of Ontario and the drug producers. I have not heard of any other provinces where that problem exists. Also, the list is a very special list; it is a list for which the Government of Ontario has the entire responsibility. Perhaps what we are doing here is mixing too many issues. However, as I said in my speech if the Drug Prices Review Board had been created six months earlier, perhaps such an event would not have taken place.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, as I recollect it, someone on behalf of the Drug Prices Review Board said that they would not be looking at prices retroactively. Yet, here we are seeing price increases of something over 7 per cent in one case, according to Senator David's figures. My recollection may be wrong with respect to the statistics you gave, but, in any event, 2 per cent on the hundreds of millions of dollars that we spend in these areas is a very tidy sum, and if the Drug Prices Review Board is not authorized to look at prices retrospectively and yet give protection retroactively, I think that is where the problem arises, both in Ontario and elsewhere. I may be wrong; I just do not understand it.

Senator David: Honourable senators, I do not think this is a question; it is a command. It is true that drugs are costly, but we seem to forget that 95 per cent of health costs are caused not by drugs but by everything else. Therefore, I agree with Senator Sinclair; millions are millions, although nowadays there seems to be confusion between "millions" and "billions." However, in the area of health costs the big expenses are those items within that 95 per cent that we very seldom speak of.

On motion of Senator Cogger, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND CROWN CORPORATIONS

SELECTION PROCESS FOR PROCUREMENT OF SERVICES AND TENDERING OF CONTRACTS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY—POINT OF ORDER

On Inquiry No. 1:

By the Honourable Senator De Bané, P.C.:

5th November, 1986—That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need for the Federal Government and Crown Corporations to establish a system of procurement of goods and professional services and the tendering of contracts based not only on efficiency, but also on fairness, in order to enhance the economic development of all regions of Canada.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, with respect to Inquiry No. 1, on a point of order, I would suggest that we strike that inquiry from the order paper. The senator who introduced this inquiry has yet to present it to the Senate. The item now reads:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need for the Federal Government and Crown Corporations to establish a system of procurement of goods and professional services and the tendering of contracts based not only on efficiency, but also on fairness, in order to enhance the economic development of all regions of Canada.

Honourable senators, that notice of inquiry has been on the order paper for more than 16 months. It has yet to be presented. I think it is a farce to have this item called up every day that the Senate is sitting and to have nothing done about it. I think it is an abuse of our goodwill and of our patience.

If the honourable senator who gave notice of this inquiry is still interested in the topic, once it is stricken from the order paper, he has an opportunity every day that the Senate sits to re-introduce his inquiry. However, to have that inquiry sit there just to have one's name appear on the order paper is, to me, unacceptable. I have been sitting here day after day, week after week, and month after month listening to this item being called and nothing being done about it. I think it is an abuse of the goodwill of the Senate, and I suggest that we strike it off.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, if somebody wasted this Chamber's time, it is the senator who just spoke, because I don't remember having taken up any time to discuss that motion.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I did not quite understand what Senator De Bané said or implied but I could maybe ask him directly.

Does he intend to talk about that motion which he said 16 months ago he wanted to oppose? Does he intend to submit it for debate once and for all?

Senator De Bané: Honourable senators, I notice that my honourable colleague, after making allegations, is now asking questions. I wish he had started asking questions before making allegations.

That motion was introduced when the issue of purchasing CF-18 aircrafts came up. Since then there has been an agreement with the United States which also affects to a certain extent some public procurement. I did not think it appropriate to undertake that debate in those circumstances.

It is for that reason that I intend for now to postpone a suggestion to my colleagues to discuss that motion.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I certainly respect freedom of expression. However, when I rose on a point of order, I looked in the direction of Senator De Bané and either my eyesight got worse or he was hidden behind Senator Marchand, but I did not see him in this chamber. Otherwise, I would have asked him directly and I would not have started with an address meant as a suggestion to my honourable colleagues.

TAX REFORM

DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE REPORT EXTENDED

Hon. Ian Sinclair, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 9, 1988, moved:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, 26th May, 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized to study tax reform in Canada, be empowered to present its report no later than Wednesday, 21st December, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators may be aware that the Minister of Finance has indicated on a number of occasions that he prefers, in the second stage of tax reform, to put in place a multistage sales tax and to coordinate this with the provincial sales tax at the retail level. The committee has decided that until such time as that takes place, and we can see what action will be taken, there is not much use in getting involved immediately in another study. Honourable senators, that is the reason for this motion.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 2826)

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, March 15, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for this fiscal year ending 31 March 1988 were referred, examined the said Estimates and presents, in obedience to the Order of Reference of 10 March 1987, its final report as follows:

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has periodically raised questions regarding the concept of comprehensive auditing. Last fall it was the Committee's decision to review this matter by inviting the following witnesses:

Professor Sharon Sutherland
Carleton University

Mr. G. Cowperthwaite and Mr. J.P. Boisclair
Canadian Comprehensive Auditing Foundation

Mr. B. Caine and Mr. J. Kelly
Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants

Mr. K. Dye
Auditor General of Canada

Mr. A. MacDonald
Comptroller General of Canada

The purpose of these hearings was to understand the complexities of comprehensive auditing and, if possible, to draw conclusions and recommendations for both the practitioners and the users of this process.

This report is divided into four sections. The first section describes the purpose of comprehensive auditing; the second describes the areas the Committee examined; the third focusses on issues of special importance that surfaced and includes the conclusions and recommendations; and the fourth summarizes the Committee's findings.

I THE PURPOSE OF COMPREHENSIVE AUDITING

In the simplest terms, comprehensive auditing is concerned with accountability. Legislatures provide authority to governments to collect revenues and to make expenditures. In so doing, legislatures have a responsibility to oversee the administration of the acquisition and use of public resources. This means that governments are accountable to their legislatures which in turn are accountable to their electorate.

To fulfil this responsibility, legislatures require a regular accounting from their governments of the collection and the use of these public resources. Comprehensive auditing is a broad spectrum procedure for providing legislatures with assessments of administrative procedures and practices, as well as providing opinions on the credibility of management reports. To accomplish this, practitioners of comprehensive auditing engage in three tasks:

- 1) attesting to the financial statements of the government;
- 2) auditing for compliance with legislative authorities; and,
- 3) auditing for value-for-money.

The first two, financial attesting and legislative compliance are normal, traditional, and accepted activities of any legislative auditor. Mr. Kenneth Dye, the Auditor General of Canada in his opening remarks, recounted to the Committee that since 1878, auditors general in Canada have been reporting to the House of Commons on the legality of expenditures and the arithmetic of the public accounts. He also pointed out that these same legislative auditors have periodically reported on instances of waste, extravagance, or unproductive use of public resources. It was in the 1970's, based upon the recommendations of the Report of the Independent Review Committee on the Office of the Auditor General (Wilson Report), that a consensus was reached that value-for-money auditing should be made a formal responsibility of the Auditor General of Canada. This was incorporated into the Auditor General Act in 1977.

The generally accepted elements of value-for-money auditing are economy, efficiency and effectiveness. In the reports of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (CICA), Value-for-Money Auditing Standards, these three elements are defined as follows:

- "Economy" refers to the acquisition of the appropriate quality and quantity of financial, human and physical resources at the appropriate times and at the lowest cost.
- "Efficiency" refers to the productive use of financial, human and physical resources --- i.e. maximizing output for any given set of resource inputs, or minimizing inputs for any given quantity and quality of service provided.
- "Effectiveness" refers to the achievement of the objectives or other intended effects of a program, an operation or an activity.

The authority of the Auditor General to review government spending in the context of the above three tasks, along with financial attesting and legislative compliance, are spelled out in section 7(2) of the Auditor General Act, 1977. This section gives the Auditor General responsibility to report on economy and efficiency, but limits his role on effectiveness, to reporting on instances where satisfactory procedures are not in place to demonstrate it. (Sections 5, 6, 7 and 8, which define the Auditor General's responsibilities, are reprinted in the appendix of this report.)

II ISSUES EXAMINED

In gaining an appreciation of the complexities of comprehensive auditing, and in particular, value-for-money auditing, the Committee focussed on three general issues.

The first of these was the burden of responsibility for keeping Parliament informed about the effectiveness, efficiency and economy in government. There is a clear understanding that with respect to the financial accounts of government, it is management's responsibility to maintain the books in accordance with accepted accounting standards.

The role of the legislative auditor is to examine the books and to report annually as to whether management has presented fairly the accounts of the enterprise. This is the same kind of statement that appears with every annual report of every public or private enterprise in Canada.

There is also a clear understanding that with respect to legislative compliance, it is the legislative auditor who reports to his legislature that the enterprise operates within the laws of the land and within any specific legislation that applies to that enterprise. For example within the Government of Canada, the Financial Administration Act sets down a number of requirements for the receipt and disbursement of public money. While public servants are expected to comply with this Act, it is the Auditor General who is required to report upon any breach of the law.

But with respect to value-for-money reporting, there are no such understanding. In the private sector, the final check on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the enterprise is profitability. Auditors are not called upon to comment publicly on anything that might affect this profitability. That is not to say that boards of directors or their audit committees do not call upon their outside auditors to comment on anything untoward, but this is normally done in confidence, and is not part of the usual obligations of the auditors. For the federal government, the fact that the Auditor General has the authority to report on value-for-money does not alleviate management's responsibility from also reporting. This general area of the relative responsibilities of both the legislative auditor and of management was the first issue discussed at these hearings.

The second general issue on the Committee's agenda was whether current information on value-for-money is presented in the most appropriate vehicle. All parliamentarians and most watchers of government are familiar with the annual reports of the Auditor General. These reports are poured over by some members of the press as well as by opposition critics in Parliament in the hope of finding examples of uneconomic, inefficient or ineffective use of public money.

But there are however, other sources of information on value-for-money. Such sources include reports of parliamentary committees, testimonies before these committees by ministers and public servants, annual reports of programs and ministries, and the Part III's of the Estimates. The usefulness and appropriateness of these formed the second issue for discussion.

The third general issue was the limits to the responsibilities of the Auditor General of Canada in value-for-money auditing. While the Auditor General Act, 1977 clearly gives him responsibility to report to House of Commons on value-for-money, and hopefully one day to all of Parliament, there is common agreement that this does not include a review of the merits of policy. But, there is no common agreement as to where the setting of policy ends and the administration of it, begins.

III AREAS OF SPECIAL IMPORTANCE

The examination of the three general issues described in the previous section illuminated five areas of special importance. Each of these areas are described in this section with the Committee's conclusion and recommendations.

Defining Effectiveness

In the Value-for-Money Auditing Standards the CICA, provides a narrow definition of effectiveness which stresses the extent to which a program achieves its goals and other intended effects (this is quoted earlier in this text). But Mr. Cowperthwaite and Mr. Boisclair of the Canadian Comprehensive Auditing Foundation (CCAF) stressed that effectiveness, broadly defined, should be about performance in general, and as such, is much more pervasive than simply the attainment of program goals. The CCAF summary report Effectiveness indicates that this is only one among a number of critical factors such as economy and efficiency that are essential to a meaningful understanding of broad-based effectiveness. However Canadian legislation and practice defines effectiveness narrowly and tends to make sharp distinctions between economy and efficiency on the one hand, and effectiveness on the other. The Part III's of the Estimates illustrate this distinction. For example, in the Part III for Environment Canada, the Park Canada service refers to its criteria for measuring effectiveness as the protection of Canada's heritage and the presentation of it to the public. (See Environment Canada's Estimates 1987-88, Part III (p. 4-21)). Five pages later there is a totally separate section on program performance and resource justification.

The Committee prefers this broad-based definition of effectiveness and believes that it makes little sense to separate resource justification and program performance from effectiveness. Yet members expressed understanding for the difficulty in trying to define the attributes of effectiveness. It cannot be limited to measuring solely the extent to which a program meets its objectives. Nor can effectiveness be measured independent of costs and productivity. Evaluators, whether they are accountants, social scientists, engineers or other kinds of professionals will have to bear in mind the "softness" of any meaningful definition of effectiveness. Those who look for neat pigeon holes in which to categorize effectiveness will always be open to the criticism of incompleteness and inadequacy.

In this previous discussion illustrating the difficulty in defining broad-based effectiveness, we have focussed on the practitioners. The clients of these practitioners within government are deputy ministers, and in some cases, ministers. The Auditor General sees his client as the House of Commons. But whether the client is government or Parliament, it is different from the stakeholder --- the recipient of the benefits of the program or activities. When defining criteria for effectiveness, the perceptions of the stakeholder may be different from those of the client. While there is no doubt that those who establish criteria for measuring effectiveness do not intentionally avoid the pressing concerns of the stakeholder, the results, however, may be the same. In the Ontario Royal Commission Report Equality in Employment, the commissioner, Judge Rosalie Abella, stated that:

"It is sometimes exceptionally difficult to determine whether or not someone intends to discriminate [...]"

The impact of behaviour is the essence of "systemic discrimination". It suggests that the inexorable, cumulative effect on individuals or groups, of behaviour that has an arbitrarily negative impact on them, is more significant than whether the behaviour flows from insensitivity or intentional discrimination." (p. 9)

In measuring effectiveness, this unintentional avoidance of the concerns of the stakeholders may lead to misleading results, or in some cases, significantly perverse conclusions. To overcome this potential problem, particularly in programs that do not cater to recipients with middle-class values, or as Judge Abella observed, "white able-bodied males' perceptions of everybody else", some committee members felt that the element of equity should be considered when establishing criteria for economy, efficiency and effectiveness. The Committee realized in proposing this that the life of evaluators and auditors will not be made easy, but these evaluators must recognize that value-for-money auditing is not a precise science and that it requires subjective decision-making.

Responsibility for Reporting on Value-for-Money

All the witnesses who appeared before the Committee agreed that government managers have the principle responsibility to report on value-for-money which is synonymous with broad-based effectiveness. Consistent with this was the view that the ideal role of the Auditor General should be to provide opinions about the fairness of this reporting. In effect, the same process used for financial disclosure should be used for value-for-money reporting. The Committee was in full agreement with this basic principle but recognized that putting it into practice was more difficult because of many kinds of problems. For example, limiting the Auditor General to attesting to the reports of management is too constraining. There may be cases which he or Parliament feel should be investigated and this mandate should not prevent him from doing so. But these should be the exception rather than the rule. Also some programs or activities lend themselves to reporting on value-for-money; these include programs with specific clients, like the Printing Bureau of Supply and Services. Others like the establishing and maintaining of embassies abroad function of External Affairs is not so easily evaluated. Activities which cut across the responsibilities of many government departments are also difficult to establish evaluation criteria and to evaluate. Some, like the employment equity activity have a centrally located responsibility centre like Treasury Board. But others activities, like fostering high quality research in Canada is being delivered by many departments, often with competing objectives. Mr. Macdonald, the acting Comptroller General summarized this:

"When you have a government department that is more like the conventional private sector model of a production process, you are more likely to find the kinds of indicators and performance measures that facilitate a more precise definition. However, as you move into the area of competing objectives and shaping and influencing, --- which are legitimate roles of government --- it becomes significantly more difficult."

The prevailing view in the Committee is that management is responsible for reporting on value-for-money. It is also the prevailing view that the Part III's of the Estimates are the most appropriate vehicle for reporting on the results of these evaluations. In spite of this the Committee was well aware that this would leave gaps in activities which are horizontal and cut across departmental lines leaving no one responsible. Such instances where there is no obvious client should be pointed out by the Auditor General.

If there is no obvious client, the Comptroller General might have to be that person. This is not in keeping with the usual function of the Office of the Comptroller General of Canada which operates as an arm of Treasury Board. Those functions for the most part, are advisory particularly in providing policy guidance to departments and agencies on financial management, in developing related methodologies and in assisting departments in interpreting and complying with these policies.

While the Part III's are already used to report on value-for-money, the Committee wishes to stress that this reporting is inconsistent. For improvements to take place the initiative must come from Parliament rather than from the bureaucracy. Mr. Macdonald stated "if you go to a committee four years in a row and no one asks a question about the Part III, it is difficult to convince a minister or deputy minister to improve it." In this regard, the Committee is very pleased to learn that the Auditor General is engaged in a government-wide audit of the Part III's including a review of the performance related information. When the Auditor General tables this report, the Committee intends to invite him to speak to it.

Finally, the Committee wishes to note that it is aware that this principle of management reporting on broad-based effectiveness and auditors attesting to the fairness of these reports is the ideal, but long-term goal. In reality, the Committee believes that while achieving this is some way off, it nevertheless should remain the optimal target. Constant pressure from the Comptroller General, the Auditor General, and from committees of Parliament can speed up the process.

Mandate of the Auditor General of Canada

We have already discussed elsewhere in this report the responsibilities of the Auditor General as defined in the Auditor General Act, 1977. While this Act says nothing about the policy role of the Auditor

General, there is a clear understanding that his office does not judge the merits of policy. Mr. Dye was categorical that auditing government policy is the responsibility and prerogative of Parliament only.

This avoidance of policy issues by any federal legislative auditor is much more explicit with respect to Crown corporations. Section 147 of the Financial Administration Act specifies:

"Nothing in this Part (Part XII) or the regulations shall be construed as authorizing the auditor or examiner of a Crown corporation to express any opinion on the merits of matters of policy, including the merits of:

- (a) the objects or purposes for which the corporation is incorporated, or the restrictions on the businesses or activities that it may carry on, as set out in its charter;
- (b) the objectives of the corporations; and
- (c) any business or policy decision of the corporation or of the Government of Canada."

The problem is not that the Auditor General should avoid policy issues, but where does policy end and administration begin. Members of the Committee took up this matter with every witness. The most frequently used example was the constitutional requirement for maintaining a transportation link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. It was acknowledged that the policy is to maintain a transportation link, but whether the various means for providing the link can be compared in terms of value-for-money was questioned. Deciding which of the alternatives provides the best value-for-money, ferry, bridge or tunnel, causes many policy issues to come into play in addition to the policy of providing the transportation link. These include concerns for employment, regional development, tourism, environment, fishing and others. In light of policies in these various areas, the most economic may not be the best. It may be that Cabinet will have to choose the type of link and leave to the auditors the role of ensuring that whichever means is chosen, the link will be constructed with due regard for value-for-money.

Professor Sharon Sutherland from Carleton University drew an even finer distinction in defining the limits of policy for audit purposes. She stated:

"I find most alarming the statement that the auditor will give the government decision-makers assurance that advice coming up to decision-makers adequately addressed effectiveness guidelines which, however, are not specified. This brings the auditor right smack into the middle of the advice stream. Despite the assurance that this kind of audit cannot tread on policy concerns, this kind of audit is a monitoring of the advice that goes into the making of policy; it is an upstream monitoring. So all the assurances about keeping out of policy are not meaningful. This kind of role of seeing whether the device that has gone up to decision makers is good advice belongs to the Treasury Board Secretariat and the central agencies of government." (Proceedings of the Standing Committee on National Finance, January 28, 1988, p. 21:19)

This matter of the legitimacy of the role of the Auditor General in auditing the quality of advice going to Cabinet is the kind of issue which finds the Auditor General and the government on opposite sides of the Petrofina case currently before the Supreme Court of Canada.

In the end, members of the Committee and witnesses were in full agreement that deciding upon the limits of policy considerations can often be a very grey area. The Committee recognized that even if the Auditor General's ideal role is largely confined to attesting to the fairness of management representations on value-for-money, his role will continue to grow during the foreseeable future because of the unclear limits to the area of his responsibilities.

This possibility places him in an increasingly sensitive and complex position and most particularly as the decision as to what he is to report upon is his exclusive jurisdiction.

The Committee acknowledged that the Auditor General has a panel of senior advisers made up of senior members of accounting and management consulting firms in Canada and it is their role to advise him on whatever issues he chooses to bring before them. The Committee notes, however, that all these members are accountants or management consultants and that because broad-based effectiveness auditing requires a much wider expertise, outstanding Canadians knowledgeable of the complexities of policy, regardless of their background, should be sought for their wisdom.

The Auditor General and his staff in conjunction with program managers also have a significant responsibility in specifying the criteria to be used in undertaking value-for-money audits or attesting to their fairness. The Financial Administration Act is again useful in guiding how these criteria should be established. Section 143(3) and (4) indicates that the criteria to be applied must be submitted to the board of directors or to its audit committee for approval. In the event of a disagreement, it is the minister or a parent Crown corporation that arbitrates this matter.

Alternatively, the CICA Value-For-Money Auditing Standards indicate that an auditor should use management established criteria, if he is in agreement. If he believes that management's criteria are not suitable and he cannot resolve any differences of opinion, the auditor should select his own suitable criteria or limit the scope of the examination to those areas in which agreement can be reached.

The CICA's document and the Financial Administration Act place a different emphasis on the prime responsibility for establishing criteria for evaluations. The Committee raises this point because again it illustrates the sensitivity and subjectivity involved in value-for-money audits. It is a further example of this delicacy of the role of the Auditor General of Canada and the need for the best advice possible in fulfilling the role.

Relationship between Value-for-Money and Legislative Compliance

Last fall, the committee examined the $80 million overexpenditure of the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion (DRIE). Two observations concluded these hearings:

- 1) DRIE should improve its forecasting, budgeting and reporting, but that this should have been required of them years ago when it was first observed that DRIE's forecasts significantly exceeded its expenditure. It is the Committee's view that excessive lapses, that are not a result of due economy and efficiency, are as bad as overruns.
- 2) The Government of Canada should recognize that when programs are established to provide multi-year grants or contributions with uncertain timing as to when invoices would be received and pay outs made, it is impossible to avoid variable lapses and overruns and that the Payable at Year End policy is well designed to deal with them. (Proceedings of the Standing Committee on National Finance, October 22, 1987, p. 17:12.)

Because DRIE was working with many small clients who had uncertain timing in presenting their requests for money, the effectiveness of the program may not be consistent with annual appropriations and year-end lapses. This does not excuse a department for slipshod accounting, budgeting and forecasting, but it does constrain the ability of the department from pressing the objectives of the program to the fullest.

When the auditors who examined this overexpenditure reported, none of them commented on the possible incompatibility of the legislative requirement of annual budgeting and the program effectiveness influenced by uncertain timing for pay-outs. When the Comptroller General, Mr. Macdonald was asked whether it was compliance or effectiveness which took precedence, he indicated that while the answer is complex, in the end compliance must come first. Senators could understand this, but were nonetheless surprised that this issue had never been addressed directly in reports of Auditor General. The Committee wishes to remind the Auditor General, Comptroller General and Treasury Board that the possible incompatibility of legislative compliance and value-for-money may surface from time to time, particularly when program recipients do not follow established and regular annual patterns that governments are required to follow. It may be that the Auditor General should watch carefully for these potential conflicts and consider the circumstances such conflicts cause for program managers.

Periodic Reporting

In the previous section, the Committee commented on the possible incompatibility of a system of annual appropriations with some programs having uncertain, multi-year commitments. There are further complications related to program timing: government managers are already committed to a five-year cyclical review of all programs and activities of the government. While there is no requirement for management to report publicly on the results of these evaluations, it is becoming increasingly accepted that the annual reporting through the Part III's are a very appropriate reporting vehicle but this is an annual reporting process. In addition the Auditor General also is required by Section 7(1) of his Act to report annually on his comprehensive audit findings.

In the Committee's view, there is too much emphasis on annual reporting. While it is necessary for the Auditor General to examine and report annually on the financial accounting of the government, there is no practical need for him to report on the effectiveness of government programs and activities on the same annual basis. But for him to do otherwise might be difficult. Section 8 of his Act does allow him to make special reports on pressing matters that should not be deferred to his annual report. While value-for-money reporting may not have the same urgency, its shift to a periodic, non-annual basis, may reduce the clogging of the system and allow the Auditor General to report on the value-for-money activities of a program or activity on a more timely basis.

IV SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

In this final section, the Committee simply wishes to summarize the salient points raised under the five areas of special importance:

1. Defining Effectiveness

- effectiveness broadly defined, should be about performance in general and should mean much more than simply the extent to which program objectives are being met;
- federal legislation and practice defines effectiveness narrowly and tends to make sharp distinctions between economy and efficiency on the one hand, and effectiveness on the other;
- when defining the criteria for measuring broad-based effectiveness, the perceptions of the client (government and Parliament) may be different from those of the stakeholder (the program recipient);
- the unintentional avoidance of the concerns of the stakeholder may lead to misleading and possibly perverse conclusions about the effectiveness of programs;

- value-for-money and broad-based effectiveness are synonymous terms.

2. Responsibility for Reporting on Value-for-Money

- management should be the primary agent responsible to report to Parliament on value-for-money for its programs and activities;
- not all programs and activities easily lend themselves to value-for-money auditing and reporting;
- the Part III's of the Estimates are the most appropriate vehicle for management to report on value-for-money, but currently this reporting is inconsistent across departments.

3. Mandate of the Auditor General of Canada

- the ideal role of the Auditor General in value-for-money reporting should be to attest to the fairness of management reports, but his mandate should not prevent him from occasionally undertaking examinations of specific cases which he or Parliament feel should be reviewed;
- there is a clear understanding by the Auditor General of Canada that he does not review the merits of policy, but where policy ends and administration begins is a very grey area;
- selecting the criteria for value-for-money auditing is a sensitive area and can lead to conflicts between managers and auditors.

4. Relationship between Value-for-Money and Legislative Compliance

- when governments establish programs with objectives that foster multi-year financial commitments, but with uncertain timing, those objectives may not be consistent with a system of annual appropriations; in short achieving effectiveness may not be consistent with legislative compliance; and finally

5. Periodic Reporting

- reports by the Auditor General on value-for-money could be more timely if they were not required annually reporting.

In concluding this report, the Committee wishes to point out that it was not its intention to make strong recommendations to government or Parliament with respect to the current practices of comprehensive auditing. Rather the purpose was to expose the enormity and sensitivity of comprehensive auditing to its users and the responsibility this places on its practitioners.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

APPENDIX

Auditor General Act Sections 5 - 8

5. The Auditor General is the auditor of the accounts of Canada, including those relating to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and as such shall make such examinations and inquiries as he considers necessary to enable him to report as required by this Act.

6. The Auditor General shall examine the several financial statements required by section 55 of the Financial Administration Act to be included in the Public Accounts, and any other statement that the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance may present for audit and shall express his opinion as to whether they present fairly information in accordance with stated accounting policies of the federal government and on a basis consistent with that of the preceding year together with any reservations he may have.

7. (1) The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons

- (a) on the work of his office; and,
- (b) on whether, in carrying on the work of his office, he received all the information and explanations he required.

(2) Each report of the Auditor General under subsection (1) shall call attention to anything that he considers to be of significance and of a nature that should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons, including any cases in which he has observed that

- (a) accounts have not been faithfully and properly maintained or public money has not been fully accounted for or paid, where so required by law, into the Consolidated Revenue Fund;
- (b) essential records have not been maintained or the rules and procedures applied have been insufficient to safeguard and control public property, to secure an effective check on the assessment, collection and proper allocation of the revenue and to ensure that expenditures have been made only as authorized;
- (c) money has been expended other than for purposes for which it was appropriated by Parliament;
- (d) money has been expended without due regard to economy or efficiency; or
- (e) satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report the effectiveness of programs, where such procedures could appropriately and reasonably be implemented.

(3) Each annual report by the Auditor General to the House of Commons shall be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons on or before the 31st day of December in the year to which the report relates and the speaker of the House of Commons shall lay each such report before the House of Commons forthwith after receipt thereof by him or, if that House is not then sitting, on the first day next thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting.

8. (1) The Auditor General may make a special report to the House of Commons on any matter of pressing importance or urgency that, in his opinion, should not be deferred until the presentation of his annual report.

(2) Each special report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons made under subsection (1) or 20(2) shall be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons and shall be laid before the House of Commons by the Speaker of the House of Commons forthwith after receipt thereof by him, or if that House is not then sitting, on the first day next thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, March 17, 1988, I will move:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Wednesday, 1st April 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, which was authorized to examine the production and use of natural gas in Canada with particular reference to natural gas deregulation, be empowered to present its report no later than Wednesday, 21st December 1988.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I am afraid I missed the last part of the honourable gentleman's notice of motion. I am sure it is an excellent motion and will do wonderful things for the world in general and for Canada in particular, but I wonder if he could again tell us exactly what the motion states.

Senator Hastings: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his kind words.

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources is at present empowered by the Senate to examine the use of natural gas in Canada and to report by April 1. The purpose of the motion is to extend the reporting date to December 21.

Senator Doody: So, it is an extension.

Senator Hastings: Yes.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, it is a rather long extension. I can see a one- or two-month extension, but why eight or nine months?

Senator Hastings: It was the view of the members of the committee that the committee would need that extra time to complete the report. It will likely be completed over the summer, and possibly by the end of September, but it was decided to ask for a reporting date in December to be on the safe side.

Senator Guay: The Fisheries Committee asked for an extension of one year yesterday.

Senator Phillips: There was a reason given for that.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

DEVELOPMENT OF COAL MINE IN PICTOU COUNTY, NOVA SCOTIA—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—ATTITUDE OF CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to follow up on a line of questioning I began yesterday with the Leader of the Government with respect to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and raise a concrete case that has apparently developed in Nova Scotia. I have in mind the report that there is now under consideration a request for financial assistance to develop the new coal mine in Pictou County. I wonder, if there is indeed such a request, whether the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has been involved, and, if not, whether the request is being considered by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion or any other department or agency of the government at the present time.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as of yesterday the matter in question was still being considered at the official level in the DRIE offices of the region. The recommendation will be made to my colleague, the Minister of DRIE, because the eligible costs of the proposed mine are over the $20 million amount and would therefore be above the maximum considered by the agencies for which I have responsibility.

Senator MacEachen: Can the minister give us any further information about the applicant for this assistance and the amount of the proposed assistance? Is this application supported by the provincial government?

Senator Murray: Speaking from memory, the applicant company is called Westray. I think it is clear that the Government of Nova Scotia favours the opening of and the exploitation of the coal resources in Pictou County. As I understand it, the proposal is to use the output of such a mine to supply a proposed new or expanded power station to be located in the Pictou County area.

Senator MacEachen: Did the minister mention the amount of the proposed assistance?

Senator Murray: I am sorry, honourable senators, but speaking from memory I cannot really put a figure on it. I can attempt to find out, however. There is an application in at the official level and it will be before my colleague, Mr. de Cotret, shortly.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the minister for his information and the knowledge that in a situation of this kind the agency will not be responsible either for the funding or for the application itself. Presumably, that arises from the view expressed by the government leader yesterday that the Minister of DRIE is responsible for sector development. Or is another criterion now the level of funding?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the applications for assistance in respect of which the eligible costs are more than $20 million are still the responsibility of my colleague, Mr. de Cotret. As I indicated yesterday, the principal orientation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is to small- and medium-sized business enterprises in the region.

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, even with the passage of the legislation that is now before the other place, the authority for this type of decision will be entirely within DRIE because of the point made that it is beyond the scope of this agency, which is restricted to medium- and small-sized businesses?

Senator Murray: It would be Mr. de Cotret's signature that would be required on such an application in order to approve it.

Senator MacEachen: Would Mr. MacPhail, for example, as head of the agency in the Atlantic provinces, be involved at all in the discussion? Is there some form of field coordination? Can the minister also tell me what attitude the Cape Breton Development Corporation is taking towards the opening of a new mine in Pictou, which, it is alleged, will reduce the work force on Cape Breton Island? Will the government, as a whole, be responsible for reconciling what is bound to be a competing or a conflicting situation, or will the Minister of DRIE himself decide the outcome of the application?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the allegation that such a coal mine would reduce employment in the industry in Cape Breton is hotly contested, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, by the Government of Nova Scotia, who contend that existing and proposed power development in the eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton area provide more than adequate markets for Cape Breton coal. However, this is a matter which my colleague, Mr. de Cotret, and the rest of us who are members of the government and have some responsibility for the region will want to consider very carefully.

As to the involvement of Mr. MacPhail and the agency, I can tell the honourable senator that from the very beginning we have been kept informed as to the development of this proposal. Indeed, the original proposal was made to us in an informal way. Because the eligible costs were over $20 million, we indicated at that time that the applicant should take his business to DRIE.

Senator MacEachen: I have one final question. Have the president and the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation expressed a view to the government as to what impact, in their estimation, a new mine in Pictou County would have on the work force on Cape Breton Island?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I had a brief but, I think, thorough discussion on this matter some considerable time ago with Dr. MacNeil, the chairman and acting president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, who expressed her concerns to me at that time. I am aware that she also met with my colleague, Mr. de Cotret, on the same subject.

Other than that, the most recent information I have comes from a report that appeared in the newspapers purporting to be views of the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation on this proposal, in which they opposed the development of a coal mine in Pictou County.

Senator MacEachen: Is the minister confirming that report?

Senator Murray: I have not done so, frankly.

Senator MacEachen: Would the minister be good enough to tell us at some point whether, indeed, the Cape Breton Development Corporation has opposed the opening of the new mine? I think it is relevant in light of the fact that the minister has introduced the view of the Nova Scotia government, which is highly favourable to the development in Pictou County. It would be useful to have the views of the Cape Breton Development Corporation on the impact that that development would have on the area for which it is directly responsible.

Senator Murray: To complete the record, I should point out to the house, as Senator MacEachen probably knows, that the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues in the Nova Scotia legislature have also pronounced themselves in favour of this Pictou County development. Having said that, I will inquire of my colleague, Mr. de Cotret, about the views of the Cape Breton Development Corporation on this matter and whether they have been submitted to him in a formal manner, as indicated in the media reports last week.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS—REACTION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Yesterday Senator Doody responded to a question I raised in the Senate on March 1, 1988, respecting the safety and the whereabouts of Maître Wade, the Leader of the opposition party in Senegal.

In the response to my question the Senate was advised that freedom of expression exists in Senegal, and that Mr. Wade did in fact represent the leading opposition party in the last election. However, he is now detained or arrested, along with all the leaders of his party. It is difficult to see how democratic practices are continuing in Senegal at a time when the leaders of the opposition party are now detained by the government.

I am concerned about the safety of Maître Wade. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would seek to have representations made by the Government of Canada to the Government of Senegal to ensure the safety of Mr. Wade and his political colleagues; and if, in fact, he is detained, that he be released quickly and, at the same time, be given an opportunity to respond in a fair and open trial to these charges. This is a very serious matter. In response to our question it appears that the government has suggested that observers—whoever these observers were—seemed to indicate that the election was fair, open and conducted in a democratic manner. It is difficult to see how that could have been the case if immediately after the election the properly elected opposition was detained and put in jail so that there was no major opposition in Senegal.

We are concerned for the safety of Maître Wade, based on the information that we have, and we would appreciate anything that the government could do to ensure his safety and that of his colleagues.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the note I have on the situation in Senegal is in French. If my honourable friend will permit me, I will read it.

[Translation]

The Leader of the major opposition party, as well as the Leader of the Party of Independence and Workers have just been officially charged with breaching the internal security of the state under the provisions of the existing Criminal Code. They will appear before the State Security Court. The examining magistrate will once more hear the accused, this time in the presence of their counsel. The date of the beginning of the trial has not yet been announced. According to the Senegalese press, about 20 lawyers, both Senegalese and foreign, have already come together to defend the accused.

[English]

My notes from my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, conclude by saying:

[Translation]

Senegal is one of the few countries in Africa to practice democracy as we know it. President Diouf has often said that this virtually unique experience in Africa remains fragile.

Mr. Clark states that he is fully confident that present political unrest in Senegal will gradually subside as the rules of democracy prevail.

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same issue.

The part of the question that I added to Senator Grafstein's concerns the reaction of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, which, through its representation internationally, had asked to be an observer during those elections along with the presidents of Socialists International and Liberal International. I had asked what the response of the PC Party was to being refused that request, and what their reaction is now.

It seems to me that this is highly significant, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs is engaged in a critique of our allies. Here is another of our allies, as you have just pointed out, that seems to have some deep political trouble. It would be interesting to hear his commentary on this case as well.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have just conveyed to the house the statements on the situation in Senegal, authorized by my colleague, Mr. Clark.

As to the views of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, I must take the position that I am not responsible to answer for those matters in the house. I would encourage my friend to inquire of the national president of that association, the Honourable William Jarvis.

• (1420)

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a final supplementary. We remain concerned about the safety of Maître Wade, and I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will take the opportunity to speak to his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and ask if he could make direct representations. Representations from Canada might be instrumental in ensuring the safety of Mr. Wade and his colleagues and fair treatment in the circumstances. I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate would use his good offices in that way in order to maintain democratic rights in an area that we are all concerned about.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not expert on this matter and certainly cannot speak from firsthand experience of Senegal, but I have just told the Senate that there are some 20 lawyers—not only Senegalese lawyers but foreign lawyers—who are involved in the defence of this man and of his associates who are accused. I would have thought that my honourable friend would consider the presence of 20 lawyers in a country that is a democracy and does respect the rule of law was, on the face of it, a sufficient guarantee of the safety of the accused person. Also, it might be counterproductive if the Government of Canada were to take it upon itself to make representations as to this man's safety under the circumstances that I have just stated. However, I will convey my honourable friend's representations to Mr. Clark.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On the same issue, honourable senators, it might not be necessary to point out that Mr. Abdoulaye Wade is a member of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians and that Canada will have this year the honour of having Honourable Martial Asselin as international president of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians. Senator Murray, the Government Leader in the Senate, has just told us that some 20 lawyers are involved in the defence of Abdoulaye Wade. It might be useful to add another lawyer in the person of Honourable Martial Asselin and, together with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to give their support in a spirit of world parliamentarianism to help Mr. Wade whom I have met on several occasions. Clearly, since Senator Murray has just recognized the true nature of democracy in Senegal, I, for one, am convinced that if we ask Senator Asselin, in his capacity as a Canadian parliamentarian and president of this international organization, to take action, this could have happy results.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is the privilege of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians to make representations to its Canadian president, Senator Asselin, but not the responsibility of the Government.

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA—STATUS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate was kind enough to say that he would make inquiries to find out whether or not the government has under active consideration the endorsement of a major new tar sands processing plant near Fort McMurray.

However, stories have been appearing in a number of newspapers in Alberta with respect to the federal government's favourable consideration of this project. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us today whether or not those stories can be substantiated.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only say that our negotiations with the project sponsors are continuing. Any project will be considered in the context of the government's policy on megaprojects, which is, first, that the project is of national or regional economic importance, second, that the risks and rewards as between project sponsors and participating governments are fair and equitable, third, that any special assistance negotiated with project sponsors will be provided outside the tax system and subject to prevailing tax rules, and, fourth, that the Government of Canada will receive an acceptable return consistent with the government's contribution to the project. The government believes this is a sensitive and fiscally responsible approach to these projects.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, after taking into account all those criteria, I ask the minister, is the government about to endorse the program? Many people have a direct interest in whether or not the project is going to go ahead. They want to participate and will be making investments. The project is estimated to cost somewhere between $4 billion and $6 billion and will involve a wide spectrum of engineering firms and construction firms. It so happens that the kind of professional people and other labour required to do this job are available now.

I am not being critical of the project at all, but these people have spread a number of stories lately. In fact, the Minister of Energy for Alberta, Mr. Webber, is reported to have said that it has reached a certain stage. I believe he has also said something to the effect that now is a good time to press for the project because of the anticipated election, but I discount that information. I expect that his government will do the responsible thing, based on the criteria which the minister has just outlined. However, the project is vitally important to the people who have an opportunity to raise the employment level by as much as 15,000 jobs at various times in the course of the construction. Is the project coming soon, or is it in the initial stages? Perhaps the honourable senator could let us know what stage it is at now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can do no more than tell my friend that the negotiations are serious and that they are continuing.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is really not a very good answer. The honourable senator knows that there are no members on the other side of the aisle in the house to ask these questions directly of the Minister of Energy or the minister who is responsible.

Senator Flynn: Why do you say that?

Senator Olson: There are no members from Alberta on the opposition side of the House. They are all Progressive Conservative members. You can read Hansard day after day and you will find that no questions are asked of the ministers responsible about such matters.

Senator Flynn: That is because they know the answers.

Senator Olson: If they know the answers, they are not making the information available to the people who—

Senator Flynn: Why don't you know the answers?

Senator Olson: I read the papers from Alberta and the information is not there. I think that in fairness the minister ought to be a little more forthcoming with information, because, as I said, a number of stories are circulating. I am sure that even Senator Flynn understands that point.

Senator Flynn: That is one thing I do understand.

Senator Olson: There have been a number of stories. One is to the effect that negotiations are in the advanced stage and that an announcement is imminent. I am merely asking if that is in fact so. The minister has not said very much to advance the matter.

Is the minister not going to reply? Is that all?

Senator Murray: That is all for today.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two questions, both asked by Senator Olson on March 2, regarding Western Economic Diversification. I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

CRITERIA FOR PROGRAM SUPPORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1988, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Western Economic Diversification—Criteria for Program Support.

(The answer follows:)

A short two page letter describing the proposed application is all that's needed to apply for Western Diversification assistance. Once the application has been reviewed to determine the project's eligibility, more detailed information will be requested.

A document entitled "Western Diversification Fund: Application Steps" has been available for some time through Western Diversification offices. Included therein are guidelines on and explanations of:

- proposal submissions
- information required in project descriptions
- analysis criteria
- legal offers
- acceptance of offers
- public announcements
- project implementation and follow-up.

It should be emphasized that methods of assistance under the Western Diversification Fund will be kept as flexible as possible. Types and levels of assistance offered will vary with the circumstances of the project, including the applicant's own contribution and needs, and the project's overall contribution to the diversification of the West's economy.

Also included in the publication are the addresses where applications can be submitted and inquiries made in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Saskatoon and Edmonton.

DELIVERY SYSTEM FOR PROGRAM

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1988, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Western Economic Diversification—Delivery System for Program.

(The answer follows:)

So far as co-operative arrangements are concerned, these are continuing under the Western Diversification mandate. Both levels of government are cognizant of the cost of duplication and exert considerable efforts in maintaining communication to avoid it.

In the 1988-89 Main Estimates for the Department, $19,900,000 is identified for Western Diversification participation with the western provinces under Economic and Regional Development Agreements.

The $1.2 billion for five years' operation of the Western Diversification Fund (WDF) is over and above ERDA sub-agreement funding. A large number of WDF funded projects are expected to involve provincial funding as well.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1988-89

SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-109, to provide borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill now before us will permit the government to borrow an additional $25.3 billion in the 1988-89 fiscal year. As Senator Frith always pointed out to us when he was on this side of the house, the passage of this bill will not cost the government or the people of Canada one cent. There is no borrowing involved in this bill; it simply provides authority to borrow.

Senator Frith: I persuaded you, did I?

Senator Doody: I agreed with Senator Frith then and I agree with him now.

Senator Frith: Did you really then?

Senator Doody: I thought I did. It seemed to me to make perfect sense!

In general, the government requires parliamentary authority to borrow new money. The notable exception is temporary loans with a maturity of less than six months when there are insufficient funds to meet disbursements under section 39 of the Financial Administration Act. With the exception of these special section 39 loans, new parliamentary authority is not required to roll over existing debt.

The deficit is projected to be $28.9 billion in the 1988-89 fiscal year compared to $38.3 billion in the 1984-85 fiscal year. However, the amount I mentioned is not equal to the borrowing requirements of the government for two reasons.

First, the government has access to $6.6 billion in non-budgetary sources of funds such as contributions to the public service superannuation accounts. The projected financial requirements, after taking non-budgetary items into account, are $22.3 billion.

Second, foreign exchange operations will affect the government's borrowing requirements. When the government acts to moderate a rise in the Canadian dollar, Canadian dollars are sold to buy U.S. dollars, and those Canadian dollars must be borrowed while the acquired U.S. dollars are added to our foreign exchange reserves.

The borrowing authority of $25.3 billion sought for the 1988-89 fiscal year is equal to the projected financial requirements of $22.3 billion plus a $3 billion reserve to provide flexibility to meet contingencies such as fluctuations in the level of Canada's international reserves.

Honourable senators, the bill before us, in subclause 2(2), requests a borrowing authority in the amount of $25.3 billion. This amount, as I said, is equal to the $22.3 billion in financial requirements plus a $3 billion non-lapsing reserve to cover contingencies.

Subclause 2(2) states that all unused borrowing authority granted by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1988-89, to the extent that the unused authority exceeds $3 billion, will be cancelled on March 31, 1989. This subclause preserves the government's non-lapsing reserve to be carried forward into the next fiscal year and also ensures that $3 billion is the maximum amount to be carried forward.

Clause 3 states that any borrowing authority granted last year by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1987-88 will be cancelled on March 31, 1988, or on the date that the new bill comes into force, whichever is later. Thus, this clause prevents the non-lapsing reserve granted for earlier years from accumulating, but ensures that cancellation takes place at a time that is not disruptive to the implementation of the regular debt program.

Clause 4, honourable senators, ensures that if a new bill is passed after March 31, 1988, and part of the non-lapsing reserve granted for 1987-88 is used, this amount will be deducted from the authority granted for 1988-89 and thus the total amount of borrowing authority available for the new fiscal year is not increased.

Honourable senators, I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has arranged to meet with the minister and officials tomorrow. If it is the will of the Senate to give this borrowing authority bill second reading today, it would indeed facilitate the committee's plans and the borrowing program of the government.

I understand that senators are aware that the Estimates have been tabled and are available. I also understand that the spending plans and the financial program of the government are also available. I am sure these matters and questions relating to them can be handled with the cooperation of the committee when it meets. As I say, that is scheduled to happen tomorrow morning.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Bill C-109, the Borrowing Authority Bill, 1988-89, is formally in good order. The Minister of Finance delivered his budget on February 10, 1988—no objection can be raised that this bill is anticipating the budget. The Main Estimates were presented to the House of Commons by the Deputy Prime Minister on February 23, 1988; again no one can suggest that this request for borrowing authority is anticipating the government's request for supply for the forthcoming fiscal year. So the bill is in good order constitutionally.

It is in good order in another way in that it does not deal with more than one fiscal year; it deals specifically with the fiscal year that will begin on April 1, 1988. It does contain a non-lapsing reserve. There was a time a few years ago when non-lapsing reserves were attacked regularly; but I guess—

Senator Frith: Who attacked it? What was his name?

Senator Stewart: —that kind of criticism is no longer regarded as valid. It is realized on both sides of the house that this is a convenient way to provide a reserve and to provide what one might call a borrowing authority bridgehead into the next fiscal year. So I say that the bill seems to be straightforward and in good order.

One might lament that in a period of very strong international economic expansion it has not been possible to reduce to an even greater extent the amount for which borrowing authority is sought. But that is a debate which can take place on another item. So my proposal, honourable senators, is in line with that made by Senator Doody, namely, that we give the bill second reading now and send it to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance where any questions concerning the detail of this request for authority to borrow can be asked and answered.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (voting procedure) presented in the Senate on Tuesday, March 15, 1988.

● (1440)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators will recall that this matter of voting procedure was before the Senate recently. It involved a vote being called in the Senate and certain senators being denied entry to the chamber. Those senators were attempting to enter the chamber through the back doors and there was an objection raised within the chamber as to their right to enter and vote. The matter was then referred to the Rules Committee.

The committee has looked into the matter in great detail and has decided that we should go back to not what is termed as a "rule" but to a procedure which is described on page 70 of Appendix 1 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, where it states:

The division bells are rung, and when all available senators are present, the doors of the Chamber are locked.

So there is an established procedure to lock the doors, but that procedure, in fact, has not been followed. The reason is that on a previous occasion a certain honourable senator arrived, found the doors locked and objected strenuously.

Senator Frith: He was very hard on the door on that occasion!

Senator Molgat: That is right. There was a slight problem.

On consideration, the committee felt that the original procedure was the correct one to follow, but the question arose as to who shall determine when the doors shall be locked and who shall lock them.

The recommendation of the committee is that henceforth we shall follow the procedure that is now followed; that is, the two whips will remain in the outer chamber, and when they are agreed that all honourable senators who are available to vote and wish to vote are in the chamber they will enter the chamber, bow to the Speaker, and return to their seats. After the whips have returned to their seats, the Speaker will then call out in a loud and clear voice, "Let the doors of the chamber be locked!" At that point the two back doors and the front door will be locked. Presumably, there would be no argument by anyone on the outside that they had not been given substantial notice, and the matter would be resolved for ever and a day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I do not rise to request that the rule be changed at all; as a matter of fact, I agree with it. But I think the two whips should go to the reading room in order to inform senators who may be in that room that the vote is going to take place.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should point out to Senator Flynn that when the division bells ring honourable senators are being called to the Senate chamber, not to the smoking room or the reading room.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, if I may add a word. On the occasion Senator Flynn has referred to there was a very interesting program on television. While honourable senators were advised that the bells were about to stop ringing, it was my impression, rightly or wrongly, that they waited another couple of minutes to see what was taking place on television, and when they arrived at the doors to the chamber they found them locked.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I think the discussion we have had will clarify the situation. In any event, if the report of the committee is adopted, henceforth that will be the rule and we shall ask the Speaker to take on that duty on a signal from the whips.

While I am on my feet, I should like to report on another matter affecting the ringing of the bells. This was referred specifically to the committee and related to the commencement of the sitting at 2 p.m. each day. Honourable senators will recall that Senator Molson, in particular, raised the matter. Not being in one of the two parties, and sitting as an Independent, he likely is not given the reasons for delays in beginning a sitting. Nevertheless, the Rules Committee looked into the matter very carefully—in fact, exhaustively, I might say—and came to the conclusion that there was no easy solution. A number of proposals were made, such as having the bells ring at five minutes to two as notice, and then cease at 2 o'clock. Another recommendation was that the bells start ringing at exactly 2 o'clock and that the Speaker enter the chamber at that time. However, it was also mentioned that the Speaker might have to sit in the chamber until a quorum had assembled.

Finally, the conclusion was reached that there should be no formal recommendation, no change in the rules, no specific procedure established; simply to continue to ring the bells at 2 o'clock, but to ask all honourable senators to assemble as quickly as possible after 2 o'clock to avoid delay in beginning the sitting.

It was felt that establishing a new rule would be much more complicated than continuing the current practice. So all honourable senators are requested to follow the procedure by practice rather than by rule.

I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to obtain the views of my honourable friend on the length of time the bells ring. What concerns me is that the bells go on ringing, not for just five minutes but for ten minutes and even longer, and no one seems to be on hand to say, "We have had enough of this. Let the bells stop ringing and let us proceed!"

If we follow the suggestion that has just been made—and I suppose we will—I wonder if it is practical to say, "And, furthermore, that the bells shall ring for only five minutes." Then, unless there is an exception that might be authorized by the Speaker or someone else in authority, the bells ring for only five minutes and then cease, and that is when all honourable senators are expected to be present. Otherwise, senators will wait until the bells stop ringing and will then come rushing into the chamber. Ringing the bells for a lengthy period of time, to my mind, is counterproductive.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (public petitions) presented in the Senate on Tuesday, March 15, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the matter that we deal with in the Sixth Report has to do with the presentation of petitions to the Senate. Again, this matter was raised by honourable senators and referred to the Rules Committee.

I refer honourable senators again not to rules but to the practice of the Senate, and in particular to page 67 of Appendix 1 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

The problem that arose, and which the committee considered, was the request made by certain senators that the text of the petition itself and the list of names be included in Senate Debates and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. It was determined that this was a costly procedure and, further, that it was an awkward procedure in that it meant a tremendous amount of extra work for the staff and on at least one occasion delayed the publication of Senate Debates the following day.

The committee considered this very carefully. The committee considered the practice that is currently followed in the other place and recommends that henceforth names not be printed and that the petition itself not be printed.

Senators must at all times be able to present petitions from citizens, but in order to handle this in a practical manner it is the recommendation of the committee that the senator so doing be asked to state briefly what the petition is about and how many signatures are on it, if he or she so wishes. But in future there will not be any printing, as such, of those names. This recommendation separates the procedures to be followed for those petitions in the form of requests from a large number of citizens from the procedures relating to petitions for private bills.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I should like to know if such a petition will be tabled after its presentation.

Senator Molgat: Yes, the intention is that the petition will be tabled and will form part of the records of the Senate, but it will not be printed in the Minutes or in the Debates.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Will it be mandatory to provide the number of signatories to the petition?

Senator Molgat: No, honourable senators, if the senator presenting a petition does not wish to say, for example, "I have 7,000 names from Prince Edward Island," it is not necessary for him to do so; it will be satisfactory just to present the petition. If he wants to provide the number of signatories, however, that is something else.

Senator Frith: It would be something to have 7,000 names from Prince Edward Island, at any rate.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if the committee is prepared to come to order I will ask our first witness to join us.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Professor Albert W. Johnson was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome our first witness this afternoon, Professor Albert Johnson, who, I believe, is well known to most senators from his long involvement in the public service, both at the provincial and federal levels, and in the CBC. I think that no further details are required from me in introducing him.

Professor Johnson, we have an hour at our disposal. Our preference is to allow for a 15- or 20-minute presentation, to be followed by questions from senators. Unfortunately, I must adhere to our time limit, because other witnesses are to appear after you. Please proceed.

Professor Albert W. Johnson, Department of Political Science, University of Toronto: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Honourable senators, it is really a great honour for me to appear before this forum—indeed, to appear on the floor of the Senate. I think the last time I was on the floor of any legislative body was in the other place during reviews of the Estimates. I used to whisper in ministers' ears what I hoped were the correct answers.

Honourable senators, I will start on the Meech Lake Accord with its starting point; namely, the ultimate purpose of increasing the bonds of nationhood between Quebec and the rest of Canada. I can only assume that when one says "Quebec" one is talking about the people of Quebec, and that when one says "Canada" one is talking about the people of Canada. I would have expected and hoped that in the Meech Lake Accord there would have been provisions that recognized this, the ultimate bond of nationhood. Unfortunately, there are not.

The Meech Lake Accord has to do with governments; it has little to do with citizens. The question, therefore, that must be raised is whether the changed arrangements will contribute to the increasing bonds of nationhood felt by the people of Quebec and by the people of the whole of Canada. My answer is that I am afraid they will not, and my reasons will follow.

I refer, first, to the bonds of nationhood in question. I think that one of the important bonds of nationhood is the shared right of Canadians to certain common public services such as Medicare, unemployment insurance, and so on. Meech Lake seriously weakens the power of Parliament to establish such new national public services. Second, one of the bonds of nationhood is the recognition of, esteem for and concern with the well-being of the national institutions of the country. Meech Lake, in my judgment, weakens the national institutions in favour of the provincial governments, and, in the course of doing so, I fear that in the future it may weaken the respect and esteem of which I speak.

If I may, I will speak briefly about national programs. I do not need to remind anyone in this chamber that virtually all of the social advances in this country were accomplished either by a constitutional amendment or by shared-cost programs. Unemployment insurance was brought about through a constitutional amendment. Although, with respect to old age security, there was some question whether an amendment to the Constitution was required—perhaps the spending power could have been used—nevertheless, there was an amendment to the Constitution in 1951 that made old age security possible. There were other amendments in respect of the Canada Pension Plan and disability allowances. We all know that hospitalization and Medicare are the products of shared-cost programs. Old age pensions, indeed, were virtually the original subject of shared-cost programs. Disabled persons allowances, blind persons allowances and unemployment assistance all led to the Canada Assistance Plan and are all shared-cost programs. I like recalling that, indeed, the TransCanada highway was the consequence of a shared-cost program. The Meech Lake Accord weakens both the formula for amending the Constitution and the spending power by providing, in essence, that provincial governments may in certain circumstances opt out of the constitutional amendment concerned or the federal-provincial shared-cost programs concerned, and may do so with full compensation. We all know that this has been called "special status" for some years within and by governments and legislative bodies in the province of Quebec. Now this "special status" is extended to every province.

With regard to the spending power, I have to start out by saying that there is one. I read some of the things my academic colleagues say, and they lead one to believe that there is not such a thing, or it is questionable that it exists. One need only refer to the 1937 decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I will not read it to honourable members, because that would be redundant. This decision makes clear that there is a spending power. One need only recall that there has never been a challenge in the courts by any provincial government concerning the existence of spending power. There is, of course, a case before the courts now—the Winterhaven Stables case—which was decided in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the spending power. That case is now under appeal. There is also the medical case.

As a generalization, we in Canada have behaved as if there was spending power, and we have recognized its origins in the interpretations of the Constitution. The Meech Lake Accord weakens that. Meech Lake says, in effect, that any province can opt out of a new shared-cost program provided that that province has or operates or initiates a program which is compatible with the national objectives of the national program.

It is important to recognize the difference between these words and the vocabulary of shared-cost arrangements. In the vocabulary of shared-cost arrangements—I refer particularly to Medicare—it was deliberately decided that certain principles would be established in the legislation of this Parliament, and that the government would then share the costs of the programs operated by provinces which accorded with those principles. I repeat, the word "principles" was chosen very deliberately. It meant criteria, and these criteria are conformed to. One need only think of the Canada Health Act to recognize that this was a deliberate and conscious act.

Now Meech Lake says "compatible with national objectives." One is forced to wonder why there is the choice of the word "objectives" and the apparent discarding of the vocabulary of shared-cost programs and spending power, which are governed by the same principles. I think the change weakens it. An objective is the object of an action.

One also has to ask about the word "compatible." It is true that in the English language the word "compatible" has two meanings: capable of existing alongside something else or, in the alternative, concordant or consistent with or congruous. The French word "comptable" has only the first meaning.

So a province may opt out of a new shared-cost program provided it has something which is capable of living alongside the end object of the program. I say that weakens it. The amending power, similarly, accords, in this case, to the dissenting provinces, those provinces which dissent from an amendment which the required number of provinces have approved. This would authorize the Parliament of Canada to undertake a national program which it would not otherwise be authorized to do. Under Meech Lake the province which continues to dissent is entitled to compensation. Meech Lake extends the original formula of 1982, which had to do with education and culture. Thus, in my judgment, national programs have been weakened.

National institutions have similarly been weakened. Essentially, Meech Lake means to me that elected institutions of the national government will be limited or constrained in the exercise of their powers by the empowerment of the provinces—provincial governments or their delegates—to interpose their views at strategic points in the federal decision-making process. This is accomplished in three steps.

Step one is to constitutionalize federal-provincial conferences. We know that conferences of First Ministers already have a substantial influence, at least as long as television cameras are present at the conferences. One need only ask an elected member of the other House and he or she will tell you that the powers of the First Ministers' conferences are substantial. However, under Meech Lake they would be "legitimized." The elected members of this Parliament of Canada would see their powers further diminish.

I cannot help but say parenthetically that it also introduces a new notion concerning responsible government. Here is a body which cannot be described as a responsible body in any sense of the word, that is, responsible in the kind of fiscal and electoral sense for national matters, and, yet, that non-responsible body is being enshrined in the Constitution.

Step two is to transform the Senate into a house of provincial delegates. The premiers, as we all know, will nominate and, therefore, in the final analysis, choose senators. In the process of doing this the Meech Lake Accord legitimizes the idea of an appointed Senate. It also legitimizes the plenary powers.

I think I draw not too long a bow when I say that I can well imagine the possibility of a premier saying, in a federal-provincial conference, "Prime Minister, if you don't really like this point of view, there is always the possibility of having it reconsidered in the Senate—the house of provincial delegates." That changes the dynamics of federal-provincial relations, in my view.

With regard to step three, the accord alters the Constitution in such a way that future changes in respect of the Senate will require the unanimous approval of all premiers.

If you will bear with me, I would like to speak as a Saskatchewanian. I am a Saskatchewanian. From my first political consciousness I knew that we were powerless. Saskatchewan has 14 seats out of 282 in the House of Commons, and our representation in the Senate, proportionately, is not that much better. I was raised with the western mythology, "Hate the East, hate the banks, hate Toronto, hate elevator companies, hate the CPR." I could go through that lexicon. I have become troubled with it over the years, because it still is there. It is no weaker than it was.

I say to myself that I must search for a way of healing this sore in the body politic of the nation. To do that one can only erect either a counter-mythology or one must look to the roots of the mythology. The roots of the mythology, in my judgment, clearly lie in powerlessness.

● (1510)

The only way I can conceive of for remedying this powerlessness is to have an elected Senate, and a Senate which provides to the smaller provinces, all eight of us, some reasonable representation with full power in this Parliament. There is no point in anyone saying to me, as it has been said to me in some of the academic forums on the subject of the Meech Lake Accord, "But, after all, you believe in representation by population." My answer is, "Look, if I believed in representation by population in Canada I would not have a federal system at all." This provision of Meech Lake is a pronouncement to me as a Saskatchewanian that we will remain powerless through my generation, my children's generation, and goodness knows how long from there. That weakens the bond of nationhood.

The fair question, I suppose, is what I would do about Meech Lake. I have not advised the government for a long time, and maybe I have become rusty on responsible advice, but there are two views that I would like to conclude by expressing.

First, I wonder whether it would not be a good idea for the amending formula in the Constitution to be altered so as to provide that, before the First Ministers meet in respect of any amendment to the Constitution, the legislative bodies of this country would have their committee hearings concerning the proposals that would be considered at the meeting of the First Ministers. What would be wrong with saying in the Constitution that the legislative bodies of this country would hear from the people of Canada before the First Ministers met? The First Ministers would still have the full right to meet in camera—I have not come to believe that all government can be conducted in public—but the First Ministers would be informed by not only the legislative bodies but also by the people who were heard by the legislative bodies.

My second thought is that it might not be too preposterous to suggest that the fathers of Meech Lake meet once more after having received the reports of these legislative committees, if necessary, to do nothing more than respond to the simple question as to why they remain opposed to some of the principal issues or questions which have been raised in committees like yours.

My third suggestion—and I think this will not surprise you—is that along with the search for some answer to the question of bonds of nationhood in respect of Quebec one should also seek some answer to the question of bonds of nationhood in respect of the other regions of the country. I believe profoundly that Meech Lake should not go forward unless it provides now for Senate reform and provides for a reasonable representation of the people in this country who feel powerlessness for reasons other than that of being in a minority position in terms of language and culture.

For what it is worth, those are my thoughts concerning the possibilities and Meech Lake.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Johnson. I have a number of names on my list of senators who wish to pursue the matter further with you.

First on my list is Senator MacEachen, followed by Senator Barrootes.

Senator MacEachen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank Mr. Johnson for his presentation and for his willingness to appear before us in his present capacity as a professor, which gives him even greater liberty than he has had in his many past manifestations or professions.

I am interested particularly in discussing the spending power provisions. I do so because, when I made a few comments in the Senate following the announcement of the Meech Lake Accord, I did not have much time to examine the results of the federal-provincial conference, but one of the things I said, on quick notice, was that I could not see how, if Meech Lake were in effect, we would have Medicare. That was not because of the careful analysis that I now see that you have made but was a rather quick, intuitive reaction to what had been put forward under the spending power.

I certainly remember that a number of important provinces were violently opposed to Medicare. Certainly the Province of Alberta was opposed, as was the Province of Ontario. My own Province of Nova Scotia was quite unsympathetic, in the early stages, to going along with Medicare. It was, in fact, implemented in a controversial atmosphere. It appeared to me that if there had been an ability on the part of certain provinces to opt out of that program that is what quite a number of provinces would have done, and we would not have Medicare as we have today. But I want to talk about the terms "objective" and "compatible."

You have given different definitions for the word "objective," and the principle as found in the dictionary—and I have no complaint about that; I think it is perfectly clear that there is a difference. But under Meech Lake would it not be possible for a government to state its national objectives in the legislation in much the same way that the principles were stated by the federal legislation? For example, one of the objectives could be universality, and it could be put in the form of those principles which we now regard as absolutely basic to the national Medicare system. I would like to know whether you think that would be possible.

I then come to the word "compatible." I know that you have found great difficulty in the application of that word, because it gives considerable latitude to the provinces in the type of plans or initiatives that they might put into place, which are "compatible with the national objectives."

Let us take Medicare again. If the Meech Lake Accord had been in effect when Medicare was introduced, it would appear to me that if the Province of Ontario, for example, could have qualified under the opting-out and compensation provision, it could then have put in place a program that would not necessarily have been universal in its application nor, indeed, comprehensive in its coverage. However, such a program or initiative that was lacking in comprehensiveness or in universality would still have been consistent with the national objective under the Meech Lake Accord, because it would be regarded, possibly, as a first step.

I would like you to tell me whether you still regard as fatal the word "objective"—rather than "principle"—if the objectives were put in the legislation. I make these comments in order to elicit further reaction from the witness on the evidence he has already given.

Professor Johnson: Honourable senators, first of all, I observe that the choice seems to have been deliberate, and therefore presumably the word "objective" means something different from "principle". Of course, it would lie within the powers of Parliament to identify whatever objectives they wished. However, if those objectives became as precise as principles, then, of course, it would equally lie within the powers of any province or groups of provinces to challenge the validity of that legislation and the validity of those "objectives."

I put it to you that, in my judgment, we Canadians learned a lot during the setting up of the Canada Health Act. When we were working on Medicare we thought that the concepts of universality and comprehensiveness were really quite clear. It turned out that they were not all that clear; they did not seem to cover extra-billing, and therefore additional legislation was required in order to make that aspect clear. That example, it seems to me, illustrates the importance of talking about what you mean in a constitution, and not merely talking about principles.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could add one thing. I was Deputy Minister of Finance for Saskatchewan for 12 years, as honourable senators know, and I can tell you that nothing gave me more pleasure than to receive an untied cheque. You would use all sorts of ingenuity to move those funds around—in what was a little bit like a shell game—in order to do those sorts of things that the government of the day wanted done. That memory haunts me, and I say to myself that an arrangement that encourages that kind of initiative—in other words, how you can get around something rather than how you can live in accord with it—is hazardous.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask Mr. Johnson whether he believes that, under the Meech Lake Accord and with respect to a national objective such as medical care for the people of Canada, it would not have been possible for the provinces to have developed certain plans and proposals in each province that would permit them to qualify for compensation, but that these plans might be quite different and lacking in uniformity. I wonder if that is Mr. Johnson's main point.

Professor Johnson: I believe that to be the case, and that is my main point, yes, senator.

Senator MacEachen: One other question, Mr. Chairman. When Mr. Johnson appeared before the joint committee, he was told that a number of other eminent Canadians had reached conclusions different from those he had reached on the spending power. In fact, one of the members of the committee said that they had just heard from Mr. Pickersgill and, prior to that, from Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Gordon Robertson and from other academics. According to this same member of the joint committee, all of those persons had taken a different view.

My question, Mr. Chairman, is not aimed at putting Mr. Johnson in confrontation with anyone else, but I would like to ask whether he has examined the testimony that was mentioned, and, if so, whether he has found within that testimony any arguments that would reduce his concerns on this matter.

Professor Johnson: Senator, I have examined the testimony given and I am not reassured by that testimony. Frankly, I do not believe that the argument that has been presented holds up. In my view, to examine the history of shared-cost programs is to see very clearly that, unless Parliament speaks with a certain clarity as to its purposes, its principles and its objectives, and makes arrangements which will be respected—and, indeed, would have to be respected—the national program, as it affects the individual citizen, is not there.

For example, in 1957 the St. Laurent government introduced hospital insurance with a requirement that seven provinces, representing a majority of the Canadian people, would have to agree with that plan before it came into effect. What happened was that a new government, the Diefenbaker government, came into power and removed that requirement, and hospital insurance became universal across the country almost immediately. It may well have come in any event; I cannot argue what might have happened. However, I come to a different conclusion.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator MacEachen.

Honourable senators, I have seven names on my list and we have roughly 25 minutes left available to us for this witness. Therefore, I will have to ask honourable senators to keep themselves within that time limit if they would.

By the way, if you are wondering how I operate the timings, I take note of the time when the questioning starts for each senator and so try to apportion it fairly on that basis.

My next questioner is Senator Barootes, who will be followed by Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour).

Senator Barootes: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and welcome, Professor Johnson. I would like to preface my remarks with two observations, which may not be too apparent. Although you worry about the representation of Saskatchewan in the Senate, Mr. Johnson, I would point out to you that we are doing pretty well in this part of the session, because there are three Saskatchewan senators in the room at the present time, and when I count around I think we have achieved our parity in that respect.

The second observation I would make is that Mr. Johnson speaks with some feeling about Medicare. I well remember him sitting in a room in Saskatoon, towards the end of our period of strife, re-writing the legislation. You were one of three people in that room battling with the re-writing of that legislation, and I am sure that you feel a very keen affinity to it.

My question has to do with the statements you made in the first two or three pages of your brief with regard to the Meech Lake Accord weakening the capacity of Parliament to introduce national programs or national objectives, particularly in the area of shared rights. I am not sure, and perhaps you can elaborate for me, exactly how the Meech Lake Accord can prevent the federal government from accomplishing such objectives, particularly when one thinks about the statements made by Senator MacEachen with regard to how a federal government can drag on a provincial government into something or ensure that they do not object too strongly to a program by stuffing their mouths with gold. Would you care to comment on how you see the accord preventing the furtherance of social objectives or national social programs?

● (1530)

Professor Johnson: A good example can be found right now in childcare. As a citizen, I am looking for a set of rights in the program which I can carry right across my country, which means provincial plans that accord to a reasonable extent with one another. I find myself wondering just how one will go about describing the kind of childcare that will be supported by the Parliament of Canada. I do not need to ask the obvious questions. The same thing could be true with respect to home services for disabled people and elderly people. I think that the provision of these services will be one of the requirements of our society and our economy. Can we provide such services in the absence of a clear use of the spending power? I think not. I fear not.

Senator Barootes: Presuming that the program were introduced by the federal government, and that they set the conditions under which such a program would be nationally supported, do you still see a difficulty?

Professor Johnson: If the provincial governments unanimously accepted the kinds of conditions or principles I think you and I have in mind—I think we are talking about the same sort of thing—

Senator Barootes: Yes.

Professor Johnson: —then, of course, no. But achieving unanimity has not always been easy in the past.

Senator Barootes: Who should be the arbiter in such a situation?

Professor Johnson: If, in the final analysis, the Parliament of Canada is taxing the people of Canada for the purpose of establishing a national program, it should make the judgment in its legislation.

Senator Barootes: Then, should not the federal government possess, as you have described, the power to say that the program being introduced in, for example, Ontario or Saskatchewan is not—I believe you used the word “compatible,” or does not meet the national objectives and therefore certification for and assistance in that program will be withheld?

Professor Johnson: That is the situation now.

Senator Barootes: And it should continue as it has been in the past and ever shall be, as they say in the Good Book. If that is so, do you not then see a good reason for continuing the kind of federal-provincial, almost institutionalized, conferences that we have been holding, which is where these differences can be ironed out? Does it not serve a very useful purpose to have these conferences?

Professor Johnson: Yes, indeed. I hope I did not leave the impression from anything that I said that I am hostile to the notion of federal-provincial consultation, far from it. I have spent a large part of my life in the field of federal-provincial relations and remain deeply committed to it. However, I think it is important to distinguish between consultations that assist and contribute to decisions being taken by the Parliament of Canada and those that assist and contribute to decisions being taken by the governments in the legislative assemblies of the provinces, while arguing, on the other hand, that somehow the process of consultation ought to be a process of decision-making. I do not believe that this Parliament can be relieved of its power in the federal-provincial arena.

Senator Barootes: From your experience in that field—and you hold primacy in the area of intergovernmental consultation—would you agree that consultations and preceding meetings at the lower level, leading to either a First Ministers' conference or a ministerial conference, can lead to the kind of decision-making that you espouse and that you feel is not available?

Professor Johnson: I think they can, yes. However, I think they are subject to the depth of differences between First Ministers. If you say that a certain number of premiers, for example, will have a veto effectively one way or another over a national program, and if there are deep differences, you invite that process. Once you say, “Look here, you can opt out and receive compensation anyway,” then there is no need to compose or to reconcile or to bring together the views that you have as a premier and the national interest that is expressed by the Prime Minister and by the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Barootes: But the Meech Lake Accord does not in any way rule out the federal government's refusing to assist in such programs if they feel they do not meet the objectives or principles that they have set down.

Professor Johnson: If you weaken sufficiently the objectives you put in the legislation, then you increase the ability of ingenious deputy provincial treasurers and ministers to develop plans which are minimal, but which are sufficiently in accord with the federal views, and thus you lose the national scope.

Senator Barootes: As we so frequently did in Saskatchewan with federal funds when you were the Deputy Minister of the Treasury.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Barootes, he did refer to "ingenious."

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, I want to express my great pleasure at seeing Professor Johnson this afternoon, because, in my view, he is the first witness to really address the issue of spending power. If he thinks that Saskatchewan was a powerless province, he should have grown up in the Atlantic provinces. I shall ask my questions from the Atlantic point of view. What do you see as the impact of the opting-out provision on the future of less wealthy provinces? Do you see a negative impact of the opting-out provision?

Professor Johnson: In terms of the programs that exist, I would say that there would be a negative effect. That is to say, the Atlantic provinces, in particular, receive many of the existing shared-cost programs at a percentage rate above 50 per cent, if we can say that 50 per cent is the norm. I must say that with the introduction of a comprehensive equalization formula, and as long as that formula remains comprehensive and assures every province a national average per capita in provincial revenue, then I think the hazard is diminished. However, it still remains part of the general approach that has been used in the past, which is the system of shared-cost arrangements, supplemented or complemented, as a generalization, by additional compensation to those provinces who would find it more difficult to raise their taxes to finance their share.

● (1540)

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): I address my next question to you, Professor Johnson, not in your role as an expert adviser to governments but as a political scientist, which is the title you carry this afternoon.

Do you have any explanation as to why the premiers of the Atlantic provinces would have accepted the Meech Lake Accord, especially as it relates to the area of spending power?

Professor Johnson: I am sure, honourable senators, that all premiers wrestled with the question of how the differences over the Constitution could be composed. By that I mean how the differences between Quebec and the other provinces could be composed. In the absence of an opportunity to look at the people consequences of a particular course of action, I think the normal goodwill of Canadians would have caused them to say, "Maybe it will work." It seems to me that this illustrates why it is so important that legislative bodies should be able to consider issues and to hear public opinions on issues before constitutional decisions are taken by First Ministers. In the way the conference was held, decisions were, necessarily, taken in the absence of a sense of how the people of Canada would be affected by or how they feel about the measures.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator LeBlanc. I remind my colleagues that we have ten minutes remaining and I have four names on my list. Senator Marsden will be next, followed by Senator Stewart.

Senator Marsden: I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman, although I cannot resist saying to Professor Johnson that Mr. Vander Zalm's Speech From the Throne last night illustrates perfectly your first point about the failure to reduce the structure of alienation.

I would like to ask you to say a bit more about what seems to me to be a quite ingenious solution—and the first time we have heard these ideas at these hearings—as to how the process might be changed in the future. As I understand it, you have suggested that there would be legislative committee meetings before First Ministers' conferences on constitutional issues.

Professor Johnson: Yes.

Senator Marsden: Are you suggesting that those legislative committees would then bring a matter to a vote in a provincial legislature and, on the basis of that, the premier would go forward, or the premier would have heard from the people through the hearings, without reference to the legislature?

Professor Johnson: I should have been clearer about that. My view is that the legislative committees would be informed of the constitutional issue to be discussed at a First Ministers' conference and that they would be afforded the opportunity of holding hearings and writing reports. I had not contemplated votes. I had not thought of legislative committees taking governmental decisions, if I may put it that harshly. I had thought of them acting, for example, as this committee is acting and as standing committees of the House of Commons have acted in presenting their views and the views they have heard concerning the issues.

Senator Marsden: Are you suggesting that, having had the First Ministers' conference, the premiers and the Prime Minister would then go back to their respective legislative bodies, as they have done with respect to the Meech Lake Accord, to hold a vote and to have a ratification process—which is what we are doing here?

Professor Johnson: There would, indeed, be a ratification process. However, I am too much of a traditionalist to think other than that the First Ministers would still make the final judgments.

Senator Marsden: You are proposing a popular check on the power of the ministers to do what they just did to us at Meech Lake, but you are also proposing that, with respect to this agreement, the legislative hearings form the basis of another First Ministers' meeting before Meech Lake goes forward, is that correct?

Professor Johnson: Yes.

Senator Marsden: Suppose that were to happen, and the premiers and the Prime Minister were to agree on the kinds of changes that are being proposed by a number of people, would you then go back through the process of consultation again? How would you see it working in this round?

Professor Johnson: Again, I am a traditionalist. In the final analysis, I believe that the following would happen. The First Ministers, meeting again, would address this, hopefully, publicly and, hopefully, through a televised conference. Then I would hope that individual First Ministers would express their concerns or their support with, certainly, suggestions on central issues. The First Ministers would still meet, in camera, and they would come to a conclusion. That conclusion, quite clearly, would be subject to ratification. If there were to be a change, that change would be subject to the same process which you are now going through.

Senator Marsden: If I understand you correctly, this means that you reject the recommendation of the joint committee that there be a permanent parliamentary committee on constitutional reform, is that correct?

Professor Johnson: I think there can be such a thing as an obsession with constitutional matters.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I notice, Mr. Chairman, that Professor Johnson, although he now has the University of Toronto as his base, rejects the view, which was held by many in Canada West, that a Parliament of the new Dominion of Canada should be elected on the basis of representation by population, without any second chamber which would represent the other provinces. You have suggested that one technique of approaching the problem of, I believe you called it, "western alienation" would be to have the Senate of Canada elected. I will not raise questions concerning how many senators would be elected in each of the several provinces, but let me ask you this: Have you given any thought to the powers that the elected Senate would have vis-à-vis the House of Commons, elected, roughly, on the basis of representation by population, and, if so, would the powers of the Senate be different from what they now are?

Professor Johnson: I would start with the proposition that an elected Senate would have the same powers as the Senate has today.

I recognize that a double majority would be required. That is not particularly original. I also recognize, finally, that any government which has obtained a double majority is going to have to behave differently than would otherwise be the case.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Would you apply the principle of a double majority to all bills? One can argue that a government can carry on its executive functions, as long as it has money, without new substantive legislation. Would you go so far as to say that in order to get its appropriation bills passed a government would have to have a double majority? Or would you limit the double majority simply to legislation introducing new programs such as day-care and the like?

Professor Johnson: I want, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, to establish first the proposition that Saskatchewan, like certain other provinces, would have a larger membership in the Senate. Having said that, I will respond to your question.

To respond to your question, I said that I would start with the proposition of the double majority. Having started with it, I would then do some very careful work as to its consequences—work that I do not pretend to have done and could not do on the spur of the moment—to achieve the kind of objective to which I think you are speaking. In short, I do believe that there would have to be some shaping and some limiting of the powers of one of the two houses—and clearly it would be the Senate—in order to ensure that the system would operate; and balancing this business of giving to the smaller provinces, on the one hand, a sense of representation in this body of Parliament and, on the other hand, limiting the powers of the body which they would think of most—namely, the Senate. This would require a great deal of shaping and modulating of the arrangements.

• (1550)

The Chairman: Next on my list is Senator Fairbairn, followed by Senator Buckwold.

Senator Fairbairn: Professor Johnson, I welcome you. At the beginning of your remarks you said that the Meech Lake Accord had to do with governments and not with citizens. You also spoke of the bonds of nationhood that should be strengthened by constitutions; and you spoke of powerlessness. My question concerns the northern territories. Briefly, they are not involved in this process at all; and, as a consequence of Meech Lake, each of the areas where one would try to address their grievances fall, in large part, within the new section 40, which requires unanimity between all of the provinces and the federal government for amendment. I am wondering why you did not specifically mention the North in your comments and whether you have any views to offer on that subject.

Professor Johnson: I did not mention that particular situation because, frankly, I am quite puzzled by it. If you relieve the unanimity requirements, then, of course, you relieve the problem—and that is the direction in which I would go. Frankly, I do have some difficulty in reaching the conclusion, simply and straightforwardly, that the determination of provincial status should be the prerogative of the people who are now living in the Territories and the Yukon. You are talking about national resources, about a part of nationhood which has national attributes—namely, attributes in all of the provinces. Therefore, to come to the point, I think there has to be a national dimension and a territorial dimension to the decisions; and, frankly, I am so puzzled by the matter that I decided not to address myself to it.

The Chairman: The next on my list is Senator Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold: Like my colleague, Senator Barootes, as a Saskatchewan, I wish to express my delight, Professor Johnson, in having you here. I might point out to my colleagues that Professor Johnson is a distinguished farm boy who made good, and we are very proud of him.

Time prevents me from going into any great detail, but there is one question which so far has not received much discussion. I refer to what you indicated as being a Senate basically appointed by the provinces. I think we all agree that they will be political appointments. I do not believe that Premier Devine will appoint an NDP supporter to sit here as his representative, or vice versa. However, those senators will be here until they are age 75, and they might be appointed at age 35 or 40. They will be representing a political point of view which, over a period of years—or even in a short time—may be the opposite of the political opinion of the government of that particular province. To me, this represents a very serious flaw in this provincially appointed body, which, under the present rules, will maintain its membership in the Senate for a very long time, generally until age 75.

Would you comment on what you think will be the effect of that, and perhaps offer some suggestions as to how, if the Meech Lake Accord goes forward, the danger that I see in the accord—as it relates to maintaining a flow of legislation that we would like to see without the conflicts which will be inevitable in the provinces themselves as a result of this sort of misrepresentation—can be avoided?

Professor Johnson: I can see two opposing forces at work. One would be the partisan issue that you raise—namely, that the composition of the Senate, in party terms, would be rather less predictable with the premiers making appointments rather than the Prime Minister. That may not be all bad. That is a judgment that politicians can make better than I can. The other possibility, however, is that the provincially appointed senators would develop, more or less quickly, a kind of provincial view, which, because of its origins, would have a certain allegiance to the provincial government, almost regardless of political stripe. One obviously is speculating, but it seems to me that that is a possibility, and would rival the hazards to which you refer; that the Senate would take positions based upon those which the premiers were taking, or at least take into account the positions of the premiers, at federal-provincial conferences. That is to say, they would begin to act like a house of provincial governments.

Senator Buckwold: Mr. Chairman, I will not get into a discussion of this matter because of the time, but I wanted to get that on the record.

The Chairman: Professor Johnson, before I thank you on behalf of the committee, I have one quick question for you. It is constantly being said that the accord cannot withstand any changes, that if any amendments are made it will fall apart. In your view, are the flaws in the accord sufficiently grave that there should be some amendments made at this time?

Professor Johnson: First, as I have already mentioned, I believe that the accord should not go forward until the reform of the Senate, in the directions I have mentioned, has been considered. I think that is on a parity with the concern that first brought the First Ministers together on the Meech Lake Accord.

Second, to try to answer categorically the question of whether the accord could withstand changes one first has to visualize a situation in which the dynamics are apparent. It is easy to say at a point in time that nothing will change my mind over the next five years, for example, about a particular issue; but the more that I am exposed to other people, other circumstances and ideas, the more, in my mind, it is likely to be changed. So I cannot answer your question, Mr. Chairman, except with a general observation—and, I guess, with another question. I wonder whether the First Ministers, after having received the reports of the legislative bodies, would not find themselves wondering whether perhaps some changes could indeed be made to the greater interest of the nation.

The Chairman: On behalf of the members of the Senate, I wish to thank you for taking the time to appear before us today and for sharing your views with us and for answering our questions. We appreciate that very much.

Professor Johnson: It was my pleasure, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The next witnesses this afternoon are from the Métis National Council. We have with us Mr. Jim Sinclair, President, and Mr. Marc LeClair, Constitutional Coordinator.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Jim Sinclair and Mr. Marc LeClair were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: The Métis National Council was formed in 1983 to ensure distinct Métis representation at the 1983 First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal Rights. Prior to 1983 the Native Council of Canada represented the Métis interests at the national level. This body, of which Mr. Sinclair is president, now represents the Métis interests specifically.

Mr. Sinclair, the normal procedure is to allow the witnesses to make a 15-or 20-minute introductory statement, followed by questions from members of the committee.

You have not submitted a brief. That is no criticism. We do not in any way insist on a brief. I am simply saying that so that my colleagues will not expect a brief to be placed before them.

Will you be the only spokesman, Mr. Sinclair?

Mr. Jim Sinclair, President, Métis National Council: Mr. LeClair may speak as well.

The Chairman: Then please proceed.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, thank you for inviting us to appear before the Committee of the Whole. I recognize many faces. We are pleased to be able to appear before the committee.

We have had so many problems over the past few months with meetings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord with the federal and provincial governments that we have not had much time to deal with the Constitution; we have had to struggle in order to maintain the position that we have had in the past, a position that gave us some recognition. We have been trying to advance our cause, but we have been placed on hold. We are pleased that the Senate of Canada is holding these meetings in order to talk to Canadians and to obtain more information on the Constitutional Accord.

First of all, we were involved in a struggle in 1885 in the West, which we called "the resistance." The Métis lost that struggle and since that time have lived in a Third World atmosphere in that we have lived outside of Canadian society. We are in a different situation from the rest of the people of Canada. We are not asking for a constitutional change to make life better for us; we are asking for a constitutional change which will allow us to participate in Confederation. We think we have been left out of Confederation. The only institutions our people have had an opportunity to deal with are welfare institutions. Moneys have been spent on social programs that have contained us and that have contained our liberties rather than expanding our freedoms, particularly our freedom to govern ourselves. That is something we want to raise before the Senate today.

Self-government and the right to our land is very important to us. We are living in a country with a population of 25 million, in a country that is so big that one can travel for hours in an aircraft in the northern part of the country and not pass over a community, yet, we live in a land that is so tied up in terms of laws that the Métis people cannot make proper use of the land. Therefore, we have no control over our resources. Our people must have control of resources and land in order to exist economically in this country, and those rights have to be clearly spelled out and the governing powers have to be clearly spelled out.

I want to make it clear that we are not asking for separation from Canada or some sort of sovereignty arrangement, but we are seeking to negotiate the terms of our agreement with Canada. That is where we are now and where we have been for some time.

During the constitutional talks over the past five years we have tried to make that clear; that is, we want to be part of Confederation and make a deal so that we can participate in Canada and benefit from Canada's resources and carry the burden of being responsible for ourselves.

A few years ago there was a study done in Saskatchewan which determined that, as a result of an unemployment rate in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent or 12 per cent, there were many suicides, family breakdowns and problems with alcohol and drug abuse. If one were to study the suicide rate among the Métis, the problems related to alcohol and drug abuse and family breakdowns, one would see that the high rates in that regard are understandable, since we have unemployment rates of 90, 95 and 100 per cent in some communities. That is what affects our lives. Because of that we are looked upon by the public as people who are lazy and as people who belong in prisons. That is why a number of our people have struggled to obtain rights for our people in the Constitution.

We have no argument with the Meech Lake Accord. In our talks with the provinces and the federal government—and we have had a number of them over the years—we have said that we have no problem with the inclusion of Quebec in the Constitution. We note that Quebec has been given distinct society status, but we do not know how broad that term is. We have some thoughts on that. But, nevertheless, we feel that we have a right to make a deal with Canada, because we are Canada's first peoples, and that our deal should be recognized as well, and that a constitution that does not recognize the original peoples of this country is not worth the paper it is written on.

We have heard over the past few years about the goodwill of governments, and about how governments have goodwill towards recognizing our peoples' rights, recognizing the fact that we should have some form of government, but, at the same time, goodwill does not provide jobs, goodwill does not provide housing, goodwill does not give us the opportunity to govern ourselves. We have had serious problems with the goodwill approach. What we need are laws that clearly recognize our rights.

I am a firm believer that democracy looks good when one is out on the street, but democracy should consider how one is treated before the courts. When I appear in court for killing game out of season I am sent to prison because I have violated a law, yet, it is clear that the aboriginal peoples have the right to pursue their culture and kill game out of season for their livelihoods and for food. So this has caused serious problems in terms of the laws that affect us.

Immediately after the constitutional talks broke down, our core funding was taken away, which was in the neighbourhood of $600,000 a year. That was taken away without even giving notice or without giving any indication that they were going to cut our funding. They also forced us to sign agreements on education and other programs that clearly take away any powers that we might have built up, or any kind of clear-cut recognition of our peoples' rights.

● (1610)

We have had other serious problems in terms of employment and economic opportunities. We are worried about those. Again, instead of our feeling that the Constitution may promote a better atmosphere in Canada towards our people, it has created exactly the opposite effect, to the point where the Prime Minister is reluctant to call a meeting, to the point where the provincial governments do not want to talk to us, to the point where everyone is saying that we must wait until the Meech Lake Accord is clearly understood in terms of what it means and what it will do. Only then will we be able to have a meeting with Quebec and the rest of the provinces.

Honourable senators, we are left to live under a non-profit corporations act. Many of you people must know what that is—that is a corporation that cannot make a profit. That, again, is a reflection of the welfare mentality of this country. It means that we are shareholders of a corporation that really does not exist, yet, we belong to an organization. We are aboriginal people struggling for our rights. Our organization is far different from a non-profit corporation. Just yesterday, in Saskatchewan, a court ruled that our association does not really exist—the judge had the right to suspend our organization without even facing our people. He suspended our organization and transferred it over to another company—a company not of aboriginal people—to take control. You would never tolerate it if someone tried to do that to you here in Ottawa. There are laws that regulate Parliament and laws that regulate provincial governments, but there are no laws for us except those that say we exist under a non-profit corporations act.

I had the opportunity to meet Mr. Trudeau last June in Montreal, before he came to speak before the parliamentary committee. We had a long discussion about the constitutional rights of aboriginal people. I have also had some meetings with western premiers, including Premier Vander Zalm, by the way. I met with Premier Getty of Alberta, who has moved in support of the transfer of lands and some powers back to the Métis, under the provincial constitution of that province. We feel there is nothing wrong with that, that it is a move towards recognizing these rights, but what we want to see is a national amendment that recognizes the rights of aboriginal people to self-government and to our lands. That is important to us, as is our role in Confederation in the future. We want to make those things very clear.

We are prepared to go back to the table immediately. We have a letter signed by the four aboriginal leaders which clearly spells out the fact that we want to have a meeting, based much on the Meech Lake Accord, at which we could talk to the Prime Minister and the premiers. We have our principles clearly spelled out: first, effective recognition of the aboriginal right to self-government and to land, including waters, sea, ice and title within Canada; second, a commitment to negotiate implementation agreements on the powers and jurisdictions of institutions of self-government; third, constitutional protection of agreements consistent with existing protection in the Constitution for aboriginal and treaty rights; fourth, provisions concerning federal, provincial and aboriginal responsibilities for financing and resourcing self-government; and, fifth, provisions for ongoing constitutional reform on matters directly affecting aboriginal peoples, including other outstanding items in the 1983 Constitutional Accord.

We have an agreement and we are prepared to meet with the Prime Minister and the premiers to resume the talks and to make a deal much like the Meech Lake Accord. What has been asked of us over the past five years is to go to the constitutional talks and have all of the "i's" dotted and the "t's" crossed before any agreement takes place. Senators know very well from their experience over the years that you are not going to get that out of a group of politicians—that is something that has to be worked out. I think we have to agree in principle. Then our people at the community level or the regional level—the ones who will directly benefit from any constitutional agreement—will have to work out, first, the parameters of the land that they want to acquire for themselves, then the type of governing structure they want to set up, followed by the institutions and resourcing they want on those lands, and, of course, to clearly identify their membership. Our job is not to come before senators and try to tell you that "this is good for those of us in Saskatchewan" or "this is good for those of us in Ontario." We are telling you that we want an amendment that recognizes the right to self-government and the right to lands. That opportunity, once it is in law, will provide a process by which to negotiate at the community level or at the local level those agreements which should be constitutionalized as time goes on. In some cases that may take two years; in other cases that may take five or ten years.

In a sense, honourable senators, we are asking you for an amendment that will bring the government back to the table to deal with our people and to recognize our rights. We can put that in specific writing, if you wish, but we want you to make sure that the Meech Lake Accord does not go through without our rights clearly entrenched in it. We have been left out in the cold, and I do not think we will have a way back into Canada for the next hundred years if it is not done now. I do not think the Constitution will be re-opened in the future, and it is imperative that this be done now.

Mr. Chairman, I think we will leave it at that and go to questions, if that is your wish.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Sinclair. Mr. LeClair, do you wish to add anything at this point?

Mr. Marc LeClair, Constitutional Coordinator, Métis National Council: I have nothing to add at this point, Mr. Chairman, thank you.

The Chairman: My first questioner will be Senator Fairbairn, followed by Senator Neiman.

Senator Fairbairn: Welcome, gentlemen. You have listed to us some five points delineating the framework for future discussion, since your constitutional process not only broke down but then was left completely out of the Meech Lake Accord. Have you had any response from government on the five points which you have joined with other aboriginal leaders in proposing?

Mr. Sinclair: We have received a letter from the Prime Minister that tells us he is going to refer our letter to Mr. Hnatyshyn, the Minister of Justice, and states that they are prepared to set up some meetings at some time in the future. We wanted the meetings with respect to our five-point letter, which we sent to the Prime Minister, held a month or so ago, and they have not yet taken place.

Senator Fairbairn: Have you had any discussions at all with government people since the signing of the Meech Lake Accord in the Langevin Block?

Mr. Sinclair: We have had no formal discussions, but, as I have said, I have had meetings with some premiers in various parts of Canada. Some I had to buttonhole; others would not talk to me. I spoke to Premier Peterson, who, at one point, said that he would try to set up a meeting with Mr. Bourassa in an effort to get aboriginal constitutional rights on the agenda again and try to work out a deal. But that is as far as it went.

It seems to me that every time we try to corner the Prime Minister, he just does not want to deal with us.

Senator Fairbairn: One of the suggestions made to us in this chamber was that until the aboriginal people have reached the point where an agreement is almost guaranteed another round of constitutional meetings would almost not be worthwhile. I would like to hear your thoughts on that. Flowing from those, if you do not have a constitutional process, can you think of any other process that could be started to achieve your ends?

Mr. Sinclair: First, we feel that we would like informal meetings with governments in order to talk about these principles. Once we had an agreement we would need a formal meeting to ratify that agreement. That is similar to the Meech Lake Accord. We are prepared to sit down with government or governments and talk about our principles and how we feel an amendment could come about as a result of these principles.

It is very clear that we do not want five more years of bureaucrats scrutinizing our ideas and coming back with really nothing more than stalling tactics. Everyone in Canada, I am sure, is well aware of the plight of the aboriginal people, just as everyone was well aware of the plight of Quebecers. It is time that it was put in the forum where it belongs, which is a meeting where we can decide if it is worthwhile calling the premiers and the Prime Minister together in order to make an agreement.

I do not think we need any more bureaucratic meetings of the type we have had in the past. I would not agree to another five- or ten-year series of meetings. That is a waste of taxpayers' money. We need a meeting to talk about our five principles, or an offer from the government that we can discuss, in order that we can reach an accord or an amendment for our people.

Senator Fairbairn: I have one final question. Did I understand you correctly to say that your five principles are those which have been agreed to by your association and the other national aboriginal associations?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, the other national organizations have agreed to them.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Next on my list is Senator Neiman, followed by Senator MacEachen.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Sinclair, you are president of the Métis National Council. Are you satisfied that government recognizes the Métis National Council as a legal entity for purposes of entering into constitutional negotiations?

Mr. Sinclair: I am not really the president of the Métis National Council. It is a federation of organizations. Each president that is elected at the provincial level by the ballot box is then automatically on the Council. I have been constitutional spokesman over the past number of years for the Métis National Council. That has been my role.

I think that we are satisfied to a point. We feel that it is the vehicle we can use for our discussions. It has provided us with a limited kind of participation, of course, because we do not have the money to reach the people at the community level. However, I would not use that as an excuse. I think it has been fair. We have had the kind of input into the discussions that we have wanted, but we have not had the results. We have had public support, particularly in Saskatchewan. A number of city councils from a number of cities throughout the province, including Regina, have supported our right to land and self-government. We also had support from the churches, including the Pope. We thought we had enough support to get an amendment, but the premiers backed down for one reason or another and would not agree to an amendment.

I do not think it is so much the Métis National Council. We have substantially enough support to use our Council as a vehicle to obtain our rights. After that, we will have to decide what kind of structures will best serve our needs.

Mr. LeClair: One of the issues that the Macdonald royal commission had to grapple with is, if the governments of Canada recognize that aboriginal peoples have a right to self-government, how will we structure future relations with Parliament, the Senate and the legislatures? That is an issue that undoubtedly we will have to deal with.

As Mr. Sinclair has pointed out, the fifth item that we are prepared to agree to with the other national groups and with the premiers and the Prime Minister is a provision for ongoing constitutional reform which would look at how we would structure the relationship within federalism with this third order of government.

Senator Neiman: What organization were you referring to when you said that the courts had recently suspended or refused to recognize an organization and had given control to another organization?

Mr. Sinclair: We were referring to the Association of Métis and Non-Status Indians. There is a group of people in Canada who are aboriginal people, and I am one of those people, where the term "non-status Indian" has been used. To me, that is a derogatory term, because there should be no such thing as a non-status Indian.

When Canada's Constitution came into effect, there was to be no such thing as a non-status Indian. You were either Inuit, Indian or Métis. Apparently that has not solved the problem. Therefore, there is an argument in Saskatchewan about some of the so-called non-status Indians belonging to a Métis organization, of which I am the president. We say that Métis have the right to organize their own people through Canada's Constitution, but, again, our people are demanding—and putting the demands on me as their leader—that any changes in our organization must have the involvement of the membership at an annual meeting and must have a ballot box to decide on the leaders.

There are some people who do not like what is going on and have gone to the courts and, through a court action, have said that they want to be the leaders. When someone can take over a leadership through the courts, or can find a loophole in the system, it makes a mockery of our type of democracy. We want a democratic organization; we want democracy within the aboriginal movement; we want to try to promote that. In a way, that sets us back, but it shows the kind of vulnerability that we, as a people, have when we have to live under a non-profit corporations act.

Senator Neiman: You mentioned another episode where you said that you were forced to sign agreements regarding education and some other matters. Who forced you, and what were the circumstances?

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the word "forced" is the wrong word, but let me put it this way. If we did not sign agreements that were watered down, that gave the government control, for example—

Senator Neiman: The federal government?

Mr. Sinclair: —the federal and provincial governments the kind of control they want, we would not get an agreement. We signed an agreement with the federal government not too long ago for an economic development structure, where we could provide moneys to our people for small business and joint ventures. The document that came out of the negotiations consisted of 900 pages of rules and regulations.

When you have 900 pages of rules and regulations, you are almost like a puppet; someone has to pull that string before you can sign. The governments are saying they are legally responsible for the purse strings, and that is true. The law says that the federal and the provincial governments are responsible for the purse strings. We have a legal right to spend money and be accountable to our people, because for any contract that I sign or for any money that I spend at the provincial level, even though I am democratically elected by our people, I have to account to our people, and, at the same time, I have to account to the government which has given us a contribution to run our organization.

We are answerable to our people through a democratic process, but the government pulls the strings in terms of what we do with that money. So our people's needs are not met. It is the government contracts that have to be met. We are not really a government, in a sense. We are only contracted to do a job or a service for the government, and that has to change.

Senator Neiman: I would agree that, obviously, that would have to change. At some point I would be interested in getting more information on those areas to see if we could examine them further in one of our Senate committees.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Neiman. The next senator on my list is Senator MacEachen, followed by Senator Adams.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Sinclair stated that he wanted an amendment, or he wanted changes made, before the Meech Lake Accord went through. I believe those were his words.

Have Mr. Sinclair and his group made representations to any of the provincial governments and provincial legislatures? As we all know, the Meech Lake resolution has to pass all the provincial legislatures—it is precisely the same resolution that we are dealing with—and an amendment in any of the legislatures certainly would precipitate a new discussion. It certainly would put the question on the table if any one of the provincial legislatures accepted an amendment along the lines proposed by the witness.

● (1630)

My question is whether such representations have been made to provincial legislatures, and, if so, with what success?

Mr. Sinclair: The breakdown of the talks last year resulted in some anger amongst the aboriginal people, and you can well understand that, I am sure. From my own experience, I felt that I would never get the opportunity again to speak to Canada through that kind of communication. We said what was on our mind. As a result of being in politics for 30 years, I had a feeling of what would happen. So it was no surprise to me. But what I did not understand is why a government would choose not to speak to us over the next year—not to talk to us or address the issues. The Saskatchewan government chose to do just that. It never chose to open the door to have discussions in terms of our views or feelings of what could happen in order to get this back on track.

As you said, as much as we had an argument with Premier Vander Zalm, I was able to have a two-hour meeting with him in Victoria at which he clearly went through the constitutional issues and offered some ideas and support in some areas. We had the same opportunity with Premier Don Getty and other premiers across Canada, but in Saskatchewan they would never sit down and talk to us. So we are talking again about a government that has already passed the Meech Lake Accord in the legislature in Saskatchewan. The only hope that we have left is Manitoba, but we are not aware of how much influence we would have there. However, an election has been called, and we may have some influence in Manitoba. We will be having some discussions around that later.

When it comes down to the actual elections—and I think you are well aware of it here—our organization can go along federally, because we are a small minority and the federal government does not fear us, because we cannot make a change in Canada's politicians. But, at the provincial level, we can have more effect on the provincial legislature. Therefore, by cutting off communications with us they can effectively slough us aside, and we can only talk through the media. We do not think the media is the place to discuss our everyday issues; they should be discussed across the table with governments. We should be looking for solutions, but we do not find that that is the case any longer.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator MacEachen. Next is Senator Adams, followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Adams: It is nice to see you again, Mr. Sinclair. The last time I saw you was on the TV at the First Ministers' conference meeting here in Ottawa. You spoke so well that I felt that we would sell something for the aboriginal people. It is nice to see you again here in the Senate chamber.

You mentioned that you have met with a few of the provincial premiers and a number of premiers at the First

Ministers' conference when you wanted a deal on self-government. At that time they did not understand—that was about two or three years ago—what self-government means, but they should be able to understand it a bit more now. It sounds now like you have not met with them since the Meech Lake Accord came out about a year ago. Has there been any response that they will meet with your organization?

Mr. Sinclair: To me, it goes back to a fundamental question. How many people really understand the Meech Lake Accord? Nevertheless, people will take a chance on it and are prepared to face the problems that will arise from it. Likewise, how many people really understand free trade? You are talking about free trade, an agreement to deal with the United States, when our people in northern Saskatchewan, where 20,000 aboriginal people live, cannot even sell their furs or produce to southern Saskatchewan. For example, in the freshwater fisheries, they have to go through Manitoba. We are talking about not even being able to sell stuff from northern Saskatchewan to southern Saskatchewan.

When you start talking about free trade and the Meech Lake Accord, who really understands it? That is why these hearings are taking place, because we do not have an understanding. The aboriginal government is in much the same line. If I am to ask an Indian chief in Ontario what self-government means to him and his people, he will have a different answer from what a Métis leader in northern Saskatchewan might have. But it will be based on the same principle: they want the right to land; they want the right to govern themselves; they want to have that right clearly spelled out in Canada's Constitution; they are asking for a third level of government. Make no bones about it; they are asking for something more than a provincial government; they are asking for something more than a municipal government; they are asking for the right to have some economic control over what happens in their community and the resources from their lands; and they are asking for a democratic process. That is something that anyone can understand.

Because there is so much diversity in Canada, I cannot take a deal that will be clearly spelled out in Ottawa and superimpose it across Canada. I think we can clearly come with an amendment that recognizes the right to self-government and the land, and people themselves can then decide how they want to put that structure into place and how it will suit their needs, with the provisions that it will meet the people's needs in the community that they live in. The Inuit are a good example. They do not want exactly what Saskatchewan has. The amendment must recognize the right to self-government and the right to the land. If that amendment were there now, the Lubicon people, for example, would not be fighting in Alberta about not being able to get an agreement, because where would they go? Will they go to the Minister of Indian Affairs? They should have an amendment in Canada's Constitution that can tie their idea of self-government to that amendment through a process. That is what I believe should be done in terms of an amendment for Canada's aboriginal people.

Senator Adams: I have one more question. I think you know this, Mr. Sinclair, but after the Meech Lake Accord was introduced in the House of Commons and the Senate, Senator Murray said that it did not matter what they did—even what the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate suggested—that what we do in the Senate we still do today. He said that it did not matter who suggested an amendment, because the decision is up to the government of the day.

Do you still believe that, or would you like to see an amendment to the Meech Lake Accord? Do you still feel that we have some chance to have an amendment or change to the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Sinclair: I think we can. I think the accord should be open for improvements. When they brought in anything, or when they had early meetings, it was to approve the accord, to make it more acceptable and fairer to Canadians. We are asking for no more than improvements to the accord. I do not know whether anyone here can tell me this, but if there is no recognition of the rights of aboriginal peoples in Canada's new Constitution, then when will it be there? How much longer do we have to wait? The time is right now.

• (1640)

Even your own former Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau, said a few years ago that in a democratic country the majority does not have the right to trample on the rights of minorities. Mr. Chairman, I have kept that image in my mind over the years and, in coming here today, I am saying the same thing to you. In fact, I try to talk like that even to our own aboriginal groups back home, where, in some communities, there may be a mix; there may be a few people who are not Crees, who are not Métis, or who are not Dene, and I have stressed that in order to be fair the communities must practise that kind of fairness across the board. After all, we are asking for that same fairness to be applied to us by the rest of Canada, and we, in turn, must do the same thing in our own communities. Therefore, we have tried to live by that. I took that statement to heart some years ago, and that is the way I feel about this country. A democracy cannot work if the majority is trampling on the rights of minorities.

Senator Adams: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Adams. Next is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. Mr. Sinclair, my question follows on the very last remark you made about democracy and the rights of minorities. You have told us quite a lot this afternoon about the process which you have been through and the future process you can see yourself going through. I would like to ask for your comment on what is going on in these discussions with respect to the Meech Lake Accord. Some people are worried about the rights of women; some people are worried about the rights of aboriginal people, and so on. I am sure you have heard all of those arguments.

At a hearing before the Ontario Select Committee a couple of weeks ago the witness was asked: "What is more important, the rights of women or the rights of aboriginal peoples?" Also, in other parts of the country people are being asked to divide in the same way: "Are you a Quebecer or are you a woman, and where do your priorities lie?"

With respect to the question of democracy and the rights of minorities, can you comment on that process? Are you experiencing it, and how do you answer it?

Mr. Sinclair: Senator, to put it in a nutshell, when you are on the outside looking in, first of all, we want to be Canadians; we want to be part of this country. However, full participation in Canada as Canadians has not really been granted to us.

Let me say at the outset that I have some arguments with women's rights groups, and I will make no bones about it. I have spoken to them and I have spoken with others. However, during the discussions on the Constitution, and dealing with the rights of aboriginal women and the problems that they have had, the thing that worried me in particular about the aboriginal women's movement was that they focused on women's rights—which was fair, and they received a lot of support across Canada. However, our argument was that our rights are so imposed upon that we need to broaden that support to include the rights for all of our people, because, within our aboriginal movement, we do not only have women's rights; we have the rights of our children. For instance, our children are being taken out of our communities and sent to the United States for adoption, where their families never hear of them again. This was done despite the fact that that kind of activity was actually against the law at that time. We have had children taken out of their homes and put into schools where they were forced to learn another language that was foreign to them. As a matter of fact, there was a great deal of argument amongst our own people as to whether that kind of activity was right or wrong.

At the same time, senator, with respect to your question, my reply is that certainly there is room for improvement with respect to women's rights. Certainly women's rights should be protected in the Constitution. Certainly there should be equality; we support that; there is no doubt about it. However, I think, again, you must ask yourself: How far do we go? As these hearings proceed, senator, I am sure you will find out just how far people will go.

We are saying that aboriginal people want to be a part of Canada. At this point in time we are looking for an answer to a very basic, fundamental question, and that is: Are we to be allowed to negotiate our way into Canada's Constitution, or are we to be left outside, in our own land? Do you intend to spend billions of dollars on the prisons, on the welfare institutions and on all of these make-work projects that do nothing for our people, or are we to finally make a deal where we can participate fully in Canada's economy, whereby we start working and we start becoming productive within this society and stop being used as a pawn to be pushed back and forth between the federal and provincial governments, as has been the case in the past?

Mr. Chairman, that is another thing: we are not recognized by either government, in a sense. The provincial governments have said, "The Indians and the Métis are a federal responsibility." The federal government comes back and says, "The Métis and the non-status Indians are a provincial responsibility." Therefore, no one will accept responsibility for our people. Neither can we get any sort of joint action, since each government insists that we are the responsibility of the other. So here we are, sitting out in limbo, because no one wants to make the first move to recognize the rights of our people.

Senator Marsden: Thank you. My point was that those are not mutually exclusive categories. In other words, no one has to choose between being one thing or another, and I take it that you are agreeing with that point of view. Whether you are a Canadian concerned about aboriginal rights or a Canadian woman concerned about aboriginal rights, the point is that you do not have to be divided in this way.

Mr. LeClair: Mr. Sinclair was referring to the Métis women, and the Métis women would say, "We want to put forward these issues." Of course, we wanted to concentrate on the fundamental issue of self-government, so we said to them, "The Métis, whether men or women, have not been recognized as having any rights. Let us work together to see if we can find some room in the Constitution for the future." That is the way in which we approached the women's rights issues within the mandate.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: I just have one other point. Within our movement, at our annual assemblies and our local meetings, we do not have very much argument from our women, because our women actually control our meetings. In fact, there are more women at our meetings than there are men, and they are far more active.

Senator Frith: There is a certain amount of equality there!

Mr. Sinclair: When it comes to the issues, our women are far more vocal, and they tend to hold our organization together, whereas many of the men try to break it apart. The women hold it together, and they are the backbone of our organization, and I have often said that.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I should remind you and our witnesses that I have three more questioners on the list here and I believe that we only have until five o'clock to hear from these witnesses. The next questioner will be Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: There is probably not enough time in which to discuss what I want to discuss, but I will try. Mr. Sinclair and Mr. LeClair, I am very glad that you are here today, because I welcome the opportunity to discuss with you your fundamental concerns. I believe there is still much too much discrimination practised in this country against the native people, including the Métis. However, I am interested to explore with you the extent to which that is legal discrimination as opposed to covert and unacknowledged discrimination. That is why I would like to get some idea about the right to self-government.

I am not so much concerned about the structures; I understand that aspect. As your colleague has said, if the right to self-government is clear, one can work out the structures. What I want to understand is what is involved in the right to self-government. Is that a right that I have and that you do not have, or will it be a right that you will have and that I will not have?

Mr. Sinclair: Senator, that is not the way in which we look at it. As I said, we feel that we have been left out of Confederation and that someone else is making decisions for us. However, if we had self-government, for example, I would not spend $1.5 million on a jail in La Loche, Saskatchewan, a community where 2,000 people are living, 500 of whom are unemployed. Secondly, I would not build a jail next to the liquor store, and then take the people from the liquor store to the jail.

• (1650)

Senator Frith: But then maybe I would not either. So what I want to understand—

Mr. Sinclair: I am saying that this is happening.

Senator Frith: I appreciate that you want the right to self-government and that you think that we should put it in the Constitution. This is an important issue in our country. But is it a right that you feel that I have that you do not have, based on racial difference?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, it is.

Senator Frith: Or, if you get that right, will you then have some rights because of your race that I will not have because of mine? I do not understand how it works in terms of how that right is acquired. What individuals will be able to stand up and say, "I now have the right to self-government"—only natives, or Métis as well? Who will have that right, and on what basis will it be founded, on race or what?

Mr. Sinclair: It will be founded on the basis that we are aboriginal people recognized in Canada's Constitution. It will be based on the fact that we are aboriginal peoples.

Senator Frith: Which means race.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. We have a culture, we did have a culture, and we did have a way to govern ourselves. We were born in this country and we have remained in this country. We have had someone else impose their rights on us. The people who have come to this country from other places have participated in forming the laws that govern this country. We are saying that we have not been part of that process. For example, when you build a dam in northern Saskatchewan or, for that matter, in any part of the northern country, that dam takes away from the fishing grounds and hunting grounds of our people and thereby affects the right of our people to make a living. The benefits of that dam do not come to us. We really have a problem here.

This is the attitude of the Government of Saskatchewan. It does not respect our rights, simply because we do not have the power to vote that government out of office. That government can win more votes in the province by taking a redneck approach than it can by taking the approach of working along with us. Premier Devine made it very clear to us when he said, "Look, I can win an election by attacking you rather than sitting down and offering to help you."

Senator Frith: So if the government moves the dam on to my farm, that affects my rights too, does it not?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Senator Frith: I think I understand your answer. When the newcomers arrived in this country, they not only deprived native people of the system of government that was in existence but imposed their system on the native people. You feel that at that time you had the right to self-government and that you should have that right again.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right. I can go so far as to say that I can stand discrimination as long as I have an equal opportunity. I have no quarrel with discrimination. However, I do not like racism, especially when it is economic racism. That is exactly the position in which we find ourselves. For example, people who have been successful in business do not have government bureaucrats running their businesses. Successful people in business have to make decisions. On the other hand, the people who come and run our lives do not know the first thing about business. They may have a master's degree in social work. So that person should not be able to tell me how to run my business. In other words, the government wants to account for the money it gives us rather than helping us to get established and becoming economically viable. There is a danger in allowing us to become economically viable, because we will then have certain powers. We may want, for example, more of a say in Canada's economy, and some people just are not ready to accept that fact.

Senator Fairbairn: Earlier we were talking about provincial legislatures holding hearings on the Constitution. I believe that, in addition to Manitoba, Ontario has embarked on the process, and some, if not all, of the maritime provinces have yet to make their decisions in their legislatures. Will your association try to involve itself in the public hearings as they exist in this process?

Mr. Sinclair: First, our organization represents the Métis at the national level. The Métis are found in northwestern Ontario and west. We do not have any chapters east of western Ontario. In organizing ourselves we mapped out the areas where Métis people could be found. Of course, those areas go over the border into Montana and North Dakota, but our organization is based on the Métis in the western part of Canada. Most of the action surrounding the rights of Indian people or aboriginal people has taken place in western Canada. I am sure that you are aware that, as treaties were signed across Canada, the treaties signed in the eastern part of Canada were very vague and really offered no control. As you go farther west, the treaties get better and the people involved negotiated much better deals. That is why I feel that British Columbia has not signed any treaties, because the Indians were getting smarter as people moved farther west.

Senator Fairbairn: What is really behind my earlier question is, if you want to get a constitutional amendment you will need the approval of the premiers of those provinces.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, we will.

Senator Fairbairn: Are you going to get down there and tell them your story?

Mr. Sinclair: We have been lobbying them. In the past we have received strong support from many of the premiers. Before the last constitutional talks, we did a count and we were only short one premier. It was really the three western provinces that were against an amendment, along with Premier Peckford, later on, who was angry about fish.

Senator Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I would like to welcome James and Marc to this meeting. I am sure that all those senators who are not here today will read the record with great interest. I would like to get your comments on the "distinct society" clause for Quebec, on what that clause means for our people in general, and perhaps those in Quebec as well.

Mr. Sinclair: I think the people of Canada should be worried about that clause. Where does it end? How far can you go? Will it bring sovereignty association to the fore and suddenly re-ignite that whole issue? If Quebec has the right to a distinct society, why does not British Columbia have the same right? Is it putting the people of Quebec above other people in Canada, or is it putting the people of Quebec below other people in Canada? There are two ways to look at it. People may think that Quebec is less equal and that it needs special rights, or they may think that these special rights make Quebec a little higher than the rest of Canada.

Our argument is not so much with the "distinct society" clause. We have rights because we are aboriginal people. This is our homeland, and it will always be our homeland. We do not want to move away from this land. You do not see anybody wanting to hijack a plane to get out of Canada. We live here and our struggle is in Canada. As I said, Canada contains only 25 million people, yet, it is the second largest country in the world. There is land for everybody and there are opportunities for everybody. I think that now is the time to get those spelled out to avoid arguments in the future.

● (1700)

With the inclusion of Quebec, mathematically, our chances should be better in terms of getting a deal, but I am beginning to doubt if our chances are going to be any better unless you people are successful in getting something back on the table for our people.

Senator Marchand: You referred to discussions between the premiers and the Prime Minister in a way which would indicate that perhaps there was some horse trading going on. I am sure you are well aware of what is contained in section 91.24. As you know, that section gives exclusive federal jurisdiction over Indians and Indian land. I am also sure you are aware of the implications of that. Did you get the impression at those last two meetings that Mr. Mulroney was trying to deal us away to the provinces?

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, yes, definitely. I think Mr. Mulroney was trying to slough off the responsibility for the Indians. I think it would be a sad day if the Indians gave up the right to deal directly with the federal government.

In terms of the Métis, we were prepared to deal with both federal and provincial governments in order to make a deal, because provinces own a lot of the land we want and there are some powers in the provinces that we would like to have transferred to us. Of course, there are also some powers in the federal government that we would like to have transferred to us. Something has to be given in order for us to have some self-government. There has to be something clearly in the Constitution that recognizes that third level of government.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marchand. That concludes the questioning. Mr. Sinclair and Mr. LeClair, on behalf of the members of the committee, I want to thank you very much for coming here this afternoon and sharing your views with us on this vital subject for all Canadians.

Mr. Sinclair: We are glad to be able to speak to you, because you have certainly been making the headlines in the last little while. We hope that you will bring our issue into the light where people can stop and reconsider the issue of aboriginal peoples' rights and their place in the Constitution. I am sure many of you are dedicated to the rights of all Canadians and that you will certainly not pass us by.

I am glad to see many familiar people whom I know from back home in Saskatchewan, including Senator Buckwold and others, and some of our people from the North.

I am glad that you invited us, and we appreciate being here.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Our next witnesses, the last ones for this afternoon, are from the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, known as LEAF. We have with us Ms. Lucie Lamarche, chair, and Ms. Beth Atcheson, past vice-chair.

They have supplied us with a brief, which has been distributed to all of the members of the committee.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Ms. Lucie Lamarche and Ms. Beth Atcheson were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: I welcome you to our committee. Will both or only one of you be speaking?

Ms. Beth Atcheson, Past Vice-Chair, Women's Legal Education and Action Fund: We will both be speaking, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Normally we like to spend 15 or 20 minutes on the introductory statement and then have some time for questions. Would you please proceed.

Ms. Atcheson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable senators, women in Canada, throughout this century, have played an important role in the development of our Constitution. We have both challenged it and been challenged by it.

Obviously, we are here today to speak about why our experience with the development of equality rights for women convinces us, and should convince you, that amendments to the Meech Lake Accord are essential.

We accept that the decision to hear almost all of the national women's groups in the Submissions Group was made in good faith, but it is, to us, symbolic of the place accorded women's points of view.

The debate on the accord, particularly, but not exclusively, at the federal level, has been, in part, a struggle about the right to be heard in the constitution-making process. We appreciate the opportunity to be heard before the Senate. In our view, the joint committee did not do justice to the presentations made by the five national women's organizations who appeared before it. Starting from the point that the women had fears and the men had opinions, the report of the committee essentially restated the points raised by us and, in doing so, shifted the terms of the debate. Senator Forsey has pointed this out, as have others who have analyzed the report.

I think most of you will be familiar with what LEAF does. Essentially, we are litigators and we litigate test cases. In our statement we describe what those are. They are cases involving a breaking of new ground. We are particularly interested in cases involving double or multiple disadvantage—the situation where women are discriminated against not only on the basis of sex but also on other grounds.

We have been in the superior, trial and appeal courts of every province and territory with the exception of two. We have intervenor status in five major equality cases before the Supreme Court of Canada. We bring to you today a perspective on litigation of the types of matters raised by the accord.

In dealing with our cases we use a wide consultation process. Equality cases raise complex issues. They are also controversial both within our own community and within society at large. They require a very sure vision about the meaning of equality, because, when you go before the court, you have to make a very precise argument.

We think that the First Ministers did not approach the equality considerations of the Meech Lake Accord in this way, and that that very much shows. Our First Ministers indulged in the conventional exercise of adjusting federal and provincial powers in order to achieve what the Honourable Senator Lowell Murray has called "equality of the provinces," not simply the entry of Quebec into our constitutional family, as is often stated.

Apart from the broader political debate as to whether the accord, over all, is desirable, the Constitution is no longer a matter of a distribution of decision-making power, nor is it the sole preserve of the First Ministers.

Perhaps we could just briefly look at the development of equality rights in the Charter, because that explains why we come to you today and why we speak as we do on these issues. Basically, the struggle for women's rights can be divided into three phases.

The first is what we call the formal legal equality phase. It involved a removal of explicit distinctions in common law or statute law between men and women—such things as granting women the right to vote, the right to hold public office, and the right to participate in the professions. Of course, the Persons Case, which is particularly relevant to the Senate, was one of those cases. In the Persons Case the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that, indeed, women were persons and could sit in the Senate. That was a change on the face of our Constitution.

However, we all know that, once you achieve formal legal equality, the subsequent steps do not necessarily follow. You simply have to look at the place women currently hold in public life in terms of their under-representation to know that.

The second phase is the struggle for equal opportunity. You will all be familiar with the conventional anti-discrimination codes which exist at federal and provincial levels. They are directed against individual instances of discrimination and, generally, have failed to address deeply-rooted and pervasive factors in society, which result in a lack of equal opportunity for groups defined by certain characteristics.

The Canadian Bill of Rights is an example of that kind of statute. Of course, there were two famous women's cases decided by the Supreme Court of Canada under the Canadian Bill of Rights. One was the case of Jeanette Lavell, who was a status Indian who married a non-Indian and lost her status as an Indian under section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act. When the Supreme Court of Canada considered that case, it said, "Well, equality of opportunity means equality in the administration of the law, not in the content of the law."

● (1710)

There was the case of Stella Bliss as recently as 1978. She had a child, had returned to the work force, had been fired, sought subsequent employment, could not find it, and applied for UIC benefits—and what happened? She did not qualify. She was told that she could qualify only for pregnancy benefits; but, in fact, she did not qualify for them, because the qualifying period for pregnancy benefits was longer than that required for ordinary benefits. The result was that she could not collect any UIC benefits. The court said, "She was not discriminated against because she was a woman, but because she was pregnant." The court also said, "This is a valid exercise of federal power and therefore there is no discrimination."

It is against that backdrop that we had a presentation of the first version of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1980, and I believe you will see, from what I have said, that women understood that they had to seek amendments to that first version, because it looked a lot like the Canadian Bill of Rights.

As many of you know, we obtained amendments as a result of the special joint committee hearings in February 1981. Over 1,000 women made their way to Ottawa to launch an historic lobby for the further strengthening of the provisions of the Charter governing gender equality, with the result that section 28 of the Charter was introduced.

With the coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1982, which included the Charter, we entered what we see as the third phase of reform—which is the struggle for substantive constitutional equality rights; and, of course, LEAF was founded at that time.

An understanding of why we take the approach to the Meech Lake Accord that we do can be reached only if you appreciate, as we do, the lessons of that history. We have sought reform for more than a century. Progress is achingly slow and tentative. Broadly stated, legal guarantees are the beginning, not the end. The guarantees must be tested against real life situations and found useful or wanting. Women are often multiply disadvantaged. For instance, in the case of Jeanette Lavell the discrimination was based on sex and race.

We cannot rely exclusively on political or judicial remedies. The accessibility and the dynamics of both change over time, and the two spheres are interactive, not isolated.

Even if you resist the thought that governments act unconstitutionally, consider the number of cases in our history when they have been found to have done just that.

It is an insult, unfounded and undeserved, to suggest that the women's organizations and the individual women who have questioned parts of the accord seek to undermine the rights of others, including those who live in Quebec. What we seek is clarity—for governments, for courts, for our own communities—in how rights, should they come into conflict, will be balanced. We sought nothing less in 1980-81, and that is why we are here today.

The Supreme Court of Canada has yet to interpret sections 15 and 28 of the Charter directly and fully. However we may view the performance of the Supreme Court of Canada in Charter cases today, the simple fact is that we do not know how the court will interpret sections 15 or 28, and how it will relate those sections to section 1, which is the limitations clause.

Mr. Chairman, Lucie will continue the statement to the Senate.

[Translation]

Ms. Lucie Lamarche, Chair, Government Liaison Committee, Women's Legal Education and Action Fund: Although it is past five o'clock, I have been asked to take on the somewhat unfamiliar and technical task of presenting the views of an organization that is litigating before the courts of this country, using the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We would like to start by putting these views into perspective, and we hope we will then have a chance to explain the technical reasons for our reticence and our claims. Whatever the political outcome of the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, the Accord itself will have force of law and will be interpreted by the courts. Nevertheless, the controversy around the recognition of equality rights raises questions that must be analyzed in the light of the political considerations involved in the negotiations on the Accord.

The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, Senator Lowell Murray, and a number of officials of the Department of Justice, have tried to convince us on political grounds that the Accord did not affect rights guaranteed under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and did not restrict their scope. However, the fact is that so far, the same department has claimed the exact opposite before the courts, and we would like to refer here to the case of the Yukon which is now before the Supreme Court, together with the dossier of the Northwest Territories. The Government of Canada never agreed to discuss with the women of Canada the legal issues we have submitted. In this connection, we feel that the real legal issue is the following:

What is the meaning and the scope of instructions given to the courts and contained in section 2 of the Accord, when at least one of the parties uses section 2 in a debate that raises a question relating to equality rights? The fact is, as far as the legal profession is concerned, nobody knows. LEAF is concerned on the basis of its experience before the courts. It is a fact that the party that initiates constitutional litigation involving arguments relating to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms plays a decisive role in two respects: in identifying arguments and identifying remedies. The respondents and the intervenors (we now have intervenor status before the Supreme Court) must respect the case as submitted by the party initiating the case, the principal applicant.

Consequently, the government's position, regardless of political statements in this regard and especially with respect to the impact of section 2 on equality rights, will not necessarily be a determining factor. Furthermore, on the basis of its experience before the courts since section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms became effective, LEAF has been able to observe certain patterns which seem rather surprising. For instance, majority groups have been the main source of applicants initiating litigation on equality rights, and mainly on grounds not mentioned in section 15, in most cases.

Finally, women have had to go before the courts more often to safeguard existing rights than to claim new ones. May I say that to this day minority groups and women do not necessarily control the testimony or debate concerning disputes where equality arguments are raised, not any more than the government does before the courts. Given these circumstances and faced with such uncertainty, to what extent must we rely on the courts? Besides, asking women to leave the matter to the courts shows limited knowledge of or again contempt for the psychological, political and financial investment women will have to make to stand close guard over the meaning and the scope of section 2 of the accord. As a last comment on this point we might recall that the general statement contained in section 2 of the accord does not allow one to say that the problem is strictly limited to Quebec. Section 2 can indeed be invoked both within and without Quebec. In fact certain authors claim that section 2 has its own institutional value organization and that linguistic duality would have precedence over the distinct society concept.

I would not want to wear out my welcome, but I need a few additional minutes to report on a judicial analysis of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Accord. Court rulings on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms are complex because the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is itself a complex document. The meaning and scope of the guarantees included must be sought on the basis of an over-all analysis of the interrelation of the various rights, and this analysis necessarily includes section 1. Adding new interpretative concepts to such a young and complex document which is barely beginning to be interpreted by the courts is, in our view, courting danger. In this respect it seems to us that the standard of debate imposed on women since the spring of 1987 has not been as it ought to be. The issue is whether some of the Lesage provisions affect women's equality rights. We use the word "affect" because that is the word which appears in Accord section 16 which protects certain rights mentioned therein. Why, as a community, did we and should we still have to show proof that the Accord flies in the face of the right to equality? And yet that is what the government has always expected from us. It seems to us that such a political stance harbours its own sexist biases.

Equality rights rely only on section 15 and 28 of the Charter for their protection. These rights being excluded from the additional protection given by section 16 to other rights, such as the rights of the aboriginal peoples and multiculturalism, it seems to us that this creates a hierarchy where women are the losers. For instance, a restricted use of certain analogies between decisions on the rights of the native peoples and multiculturalism and the litigation concerning equality rights is to be feared. On the other hand, this might lead to litigation related to equality rights being viewed as less important or commonplace. We are concerned here with how the judiciary will view the rights which do not benefit from the additional protection given by section 16.

We believe that it is fair to say that the interpretation provisions contained in section 2 of the Accord will be submitted to an examination of the fair and reasonable nature of a restriction in the exercise of a right guaranteed by the Charter in a free and democratic society. However, we have to analyze the situation thoroughly and consider also that the additional protection given to certain rights by section 16 of the Accord will also be incorporated in the analysis of section 1 of the Charter. Consequently, the rights which cannot be undermined by section 2 of the Accord will have, as concerns section 1 of the Charter, as superior interpretative status to that of certain other rights, and especially equality rights.

In its report, the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons maintains that this possibility is not alarming since, in any case, section 15 of the Charter is already being interpreted in the light of all the rights which are set forth and guaranteed in this section and since striving for balance between all the rights set forth in the Charter is a common constitutional matter. This reasoning denies the obvious material fact that equality rights will be even more diluted and difficult to achieve as they will have to compete with the many additional elements that will have to be weighed.

On the other hand, we cannot neglect the use that the governments themselves will perhaps be constrained to make of the provisions of the Accord since, as we have already said, they are not always the initiators of such litigation. For instance, we find the weight given by the court to the basic constitutional compromise contained in section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in the case of the referral of Ontario Bill 30 quite revealing. To our mind, the final question is why we should have section 16 at all. No valid explanation has yet been provided. Why does section 16 deal only with the protection of the rights of the native peoples and of multiculturalism? Why not also equality rights?

In this regard, we would like to quote conclusion 33 of the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, which can be found on page 144 in the English version:

Many of the constitutional experts who appeared before us testified that Section 16 is unnecessary. Certainly it generates more heat than light.

Senator Frith: Did you say "unnecessary"?

Ms. Lamarche: I am quoting from the fourth line of conclusion 33.

Adding section 28 of the Charter to it would accomplish little because section 28 only guarantees equal application to men and women of rights and freedoms referred to elsewhere in the Charter.

This is the end of the quotation from clause 28. The recommendation goes on as follows:

But reaching into section 15 of the Charter to add gender equality rights to the "protected list" while leaving all other Charter rights "unprotected" would be even more arbitrary. What about religious discrimination? Freedom of expression? Religious freedom? Racial discrimination?

It appears to us that the use by the committee of the term "even more arbitrary" reflects the essentially arbitrary character of clause 16.

I will now yield to my colleague Ms. Atcheson who will add a few comments on the spending power and the shared-cost programs, and then will gladly share our conclusions with you.

• (1720)

[English]

Ms. Atcheson: Thank you. We have a broad view of equality. In fact, that broad view has caused us to also take a look at the provisions in the Accord on national shared-cost programs.

The current shared-cost programs, of course, cover a wide range of social programs. These programs are of particular concern to Canadian women who, in many cases, are the primary users of those programs. They include health care, social assistance, pensions, post-secondary education, job education and training, legal aid, public housing, compensation to victims of violent crimes, and young offenders. The existence of and access to these programs is of particular importance to those women who are doubly disadvantaged, as these women are the poorest in Canada and the most in need of these programs and services. Moreover, Canadians are very mobile. According to Statistics Canada, each year one in seven Canadians moves within the province, and one in twenty Canadians moves between provinces. LEAF has been involved in litigating entitlement to and access to these programs, and the types of cases we have taken on are detailed in the brief.

We have three concerns that relate to clause 7 of the Accord. First of all, the term "national shared-cost program" is not defined. Currently there are a variety of fiscal arrangements in which the federal government contributes money in whole or in part to finance programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Is it intended that all of these schemes will be covered by clause 7? What will be a new program? To what degree will an old program reworked become a new program?

Second, the term "national objectives" is not defined. While it connotes goals, it does not necessarily include the concept of standards. By comparison, the immigration provisions of clause 3 of the Accord set national standards and objectives. Missing from clause 7, therefore, are any minimum or basic requirements of the provincial program to ensure a nationwide safety net. LEAF recommends that clause 7 be amended to include national standards and objectives which shall include the minimum criteria of: public administration on a non-profit basis, comprehensiveness, universality, portability, accessibility on uniform terms and conditions, and provision of information on the operation of the program.

Third, clause 7 provides that the provincial programs or initiatives be compatible with the national objectives. The term "compatible" may merely require that the provincial programs or initiatives not be inconsistent with or repugnant to the national program, thereby allowing lesser and varied standards. We join with the National Association of Women and the Law in requesting that clause 7 be amended to ensure universal coverage of high standards throughout Canada.

In short, our recommendation is that to accept the Accord in its current form is to condone the process by which it was developed and to launch Canadians on a constitutional pattern which threatens the integrity of equality rights in unpredictable ways. A "round" for one set of interests and then a "round" for another set of interests, and so on, will simply ensure that equality-seeking groups will spend their energies addressing shifting agendas set by others. In reality, protection of equality rights is not divisible into rounds.

If our commitment to equality rights in this country is genuine, then let us reflect that in the Accord. Let us, at the very least, add sections 15 and 28 of the Charter to section 16 of the Accord, and add the minimum criteria stated above to section 7 of the Accord. We request that the Senate make and actively pursue such amendments. We would be pleased to take questions.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Thank you, Ms. Lamarche and Ms. Atcheson. Listed here is Senator Frith, followed by Senator Marsden. Before inviting them to put questions, I would like to ask one myself.

Some women's groups or some French-speaking women in Quebec have a different attitude from certain women's groups outside Quebec. We have been told: Why are women outside Quebec so concerned with the situation in Quebec, when Quebec women are not? What are your comments on that?

Ms. Lamarche: We should be to blame if we could not comment on or answer that question. I would like first to emphasize anew that I know of no national associations in any way disagreeing with the concept of distinct society, and more so of distinct society than language duality.

First, I am using the term "concept" because I know how vague the literature is on what could be its specific content. Second, we are aware of and have opposed the position taken by some Quebec associations, especially the Fédération des femmes du Québec, which basically made two points: first, that the concept of distinct society on the cultural level would reflect a certain feminist culture. Second, that on the matter of equality rights, the distinct society concept is neutral. On behalf of my organization, LEAF, I would like first to comment on those two points before delving on the dichotomy Women inside Quebec vs. Women outside Quebec.

As to the feminist cultural component which should be specific to Quebec, we claim, and we are not alone in doing so, that if Quebec women have effectively benefitted before other Canadian women from what my friend Mrs. Atcheson called the formal expression of equality, from legislation which apparently were no longer sexist or biased, Canadian women, however, could not aspire, on the sole basis of the existence of a Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to more concrete and effective equality or, expressed in a negative way, to fewer damaging effects in terms of discrimination or inequality.

• (1730)

As to the neutral nature of the concept of a distinct society from the view point of the right to equality, we are looking at things from a legal angle, that is to say, that I do not know of any women's associations or even representatives of other Canadian interest groups which could decently believe that the Quebec Government would invoke a priori, for a legislative purpose or in a legal action that it would initiate on its own, the notion of a distinct society which would deny the right to equality, but we know for a fact because we are before the courts that the Government of Quebec would likely react to a dispute initiated by some interest group, in Quebec, since we are dealing with the notion of a distinct society. Based on legislation of which it would have imagined the objectives and implementation, it is not unlikely that in the end there would not be this possibility that the government or another interest group involved in a dispute tried—I repeat, tried—to oppose or rate this interpretative notion of a distinct society to motivate or justify the rationale of a restriction to a right such as the right to equality. It should be understood, therefore, that if we are concerned, we are not concerned about the intention of the Quebec legislator, but about the very dynamic of a legal initiative in a dispute dealing with equality rights. I apologize if I was long in answering your question, but I tried in one shot to cover all its aspects. Now, let us deal with the dichotomy: Quebec women—women outside Quebec.

As you know, Mrs. Lysiane Gagnon is one of the women who have managed to express particularly well this view which, as they said, favoured and suited quite well women and feminists outside Quebec. As we indicated in our remarks, section 2 of the Accord does not cause any problem to the right of equality except for Quebec women. Some famous legal experts have claimed that the linguistic duality, because it is otherwise present in our constitutional structure, would prevail just the same in terms of organizing into a hierarchy or authority on the notion of a distinct society.

It should be understood, therefore, that on both parts, the interpretative notions introduced by section 2 of the Accord are notions which qualify this constitutionally enshrined right which is the right of equality, because we are not claiming a new right. The right to equality is something that we have acquired and Mrs. Atcheson has very well explained how. I do not know many Canadian women who are not aware of the hard battles which were fought to acquire the statement which is section 28 of the Charter.

We have already acquired these rights, and Canadian women generally—with respect to any of the interpretative statements in section 2 of the Accord—are concerned about the colouring. To my mind, that is a false antagonism and a dichotomy which have indeed served the government in our case.

It is false to say that women in Quebec must be opposed to women outside Quebec. What must be judicially questioned is the interpretative shading of section 2 of the Accord with respect to the already acquired right to equality.

The Chairman: Thank you. I will now proceed according to the list of senators who want to ask questions. First Senator Frith, then Senator Marsden.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have two questions and, in a way, the chairman has asked the first one; anyway, I got the answer to that first question.

[English]

My second question deals with page 5 of your brief. I would like to give Ms. Atcheson an opportunity to explain something. At the bottom of page 5 it says:

We cannot rely exclusively on political or judicial remedies: the accessibility and the dynamics of both change over time and the two spheres are interactive, not isolated.

Just to take the first part of that statement, "We cannot rely exclusively on political or judicial remedies," I take it by that you mean you also have to address legislative remedies.

• (1740)

A judicial remedy can be found for constitutional injustices, but what remedies are neither political nor judicial, except legislative? Is that why you are here, because you are wanting to address the legislative?

Ms. Atcheson: I would shelter legislative under small "p" political. If you take a look at what is currently happening with the aftermath of the Morgentaler decision, it very much shows there, and it shows in the debate around the Accord. During the early part of the debate the governments took the position, "We didn't intend to do anything. We tell you politically and we tell our legislatures that we did not intend to infringe any Charter rights, and we go further, in fact, and say to Canadians that this will not happen."

We cannot put our eggs in that political basket or in that legislative basket or simply on the face of the law, because at some point that law may go into court. Alternatively, we are not prepared to say, as the joint committee did, let us just let it go off to the courts.

Senator Frith: It means that we cannot rely exclusively on political or judicial remedies.

Ms. Atcheson: That is right.

Senator Frith: There are all sorts of other remedies such as military, and I wanted to be sure I understood what you meant. This implies you might be pushed beyond either political or judicial remedies, but that is not what you mean.

Ms. Atcheson: Well, one never knows, does one?

Senator Frith: What might you be pushed to, then, that would be neither political nor judicial?

Ms. Atcheson: In our organization we exist to do litigation. Anything beyond that would be outside our jurisdiction. We have to be careful about this, because, in large part, we are saying that we have to have a series of safety nets.

Senator Frith: Beyond the political or judicial ones? What, for example?

Ms. Atcheson: We are not saying that. We are saying that we essentially have two baskets here in the way that our laws are made and interpreted. They are made in the political sphere; they are interpreted in the judicial sphere. Those are the two spheres in which we are working. We cannot choose between one and the other. We cannot be content with the political statements, nor necessarily can we be content with having access to the judicial system.

Senator Frith: I understand. You are not suggesting something beyond political or judicial. You just cannot rely exclusively on one at a time.

Ms. Atcheson: That is correct.

Senator Marsden: I would like to come back to some of the issues that have been raised in questions previously this afternoon. Just before you appeared, we heard from the Métis National Council, whose rights and claims have been set against those of other groups. Both of you know that recently in front of the Ontario Select Committee a group that was appearing as witnesses were asked, "What is more important, your rights as women or the rights of aboriginal people?" You are very familiar with the history of women's struggle to gain rights. You have described it in your brief.

Could you say more about the divide-and-conquer strategy that has poisoned the process of constitutional reform in 1981-82 and again in 1987-88?

The chairman's question earlier raises another of the divisions: Quebec women versus women outside of Quebec, which is a false dichotomy and is neither empirically nor ideologically correct.

Ms. Atcheson: From our point of view, we look at the way courts make decisions. The courts make decisions from a broad base of previously decided cases or precedents. Whether one case may have been an aboriginal case or one case an equality case, doctrines are picked up and moved about. The court is very conscious in interpreting equality rights. I believe that we will clearly see this when we see the first section 15 case come from the Supreme Court of Canada. The court is very conscious of finding a way to balance, because they know that they do not have the luxury of one doctrine for one group and one doctrine for another group. They have to find a way to allow all of those groups that have legal protection to enhance their rights.

The problem with the false dichotomy—and it comes up in a number of ways—is that, if you look at Quebec, for instance, we do have a national legal system. Our courts are going to be looking at cases from all across Canada and deciding any single case. If you look at the major section 16 case before the Supreme Court of Canada now, there are decisions from three provinces that have found their way to the Supreme Court of Canada and are now being looked at by the Supreme Court of Canada to answer critical questions under the Charter. In looking at our national legal system, our courts do not choose. We cannot choose when we argue, and, therefore, to look at the accord that way essentially denies the reality of our national legal system.

It is easy to say to all of these groups, who have very limited resources, that somehow it is our job to do the integrating, that it is our job to essentially hold the constitutional conferences where we find the ways to bring all of these issues together. In fact, there are networks, and these groups do communicate. But that is the government's job to do that and to find a way to integrate those interests.

Senator Marsden: And politically, of course, to make them look as though they have opposing interests when in fact they do not.

I believe you may have had the chance to look at earlier testimony from this committee. Last June the Honourable Jack Pickersgill appeared in front of us. In response to a question that I raised about Charter rights and concerns of women he dismissed the "fears" of women on the grounds that no legislature in this country had ever legislated against women's rights since women got the right to vote.

[Translation]

Ms. Lamarche: Senator, I find that question very interesting because a moment ago my colleague Ms. Atcheson explained that indeed we have crossed the threshold of the expression of formal equality.

I believe that since we secured the right to vote it would have been outrageous to introduce new laws to categorize the rights and benefits one might get out of such legislation on the basis of sex.

However, that is not the meaning of equality. Equality and the right to equality go beyond the antidiscriminatory norm and call for laws or practices which do not affect the right to substantial equality and not only the procedural appearance of equality.

Canada has definitely moved into the era of substantial equality, on one hand, and the era of the search for discriminatory effects, on the other. It goes without saying that the search for discriminatory effects must be maintained at all costs. To put it another way, anything which otherwise colours the right to equality may affect this research and has to be, by definition, hazardous.

• (1750)

[English]

Ms. Atcheson: If I may also respond to that, we have said that there are few cases in our legislation where there is a distinction in the actual words in the legislation between men and women. One of the last remaining examples were the name cases, the provincial statutes that essentially prescribed how children could be named relating to the mother and father. In fact, LEAF's early cases were challenges to those explicit distinctions on the face of the statute.

To take the position that Mr. Pickersgill has taken essentially denies about 15 years of scholarly and practical understanding of discrimination and equality. If you look at something like the Canadian Human Rights Act, the federal statute, it recognizes that there is such a thing as systemic discrimination, adverse impact, adverse effect. In fact, it is where a provision may not distinguish between men and women, blacks and whites, or new immigrants and Canadian citizens, but in its application, or even in the way that it is administered, it clearly impacts on one group more heavily than another to deny them something.

There have been studies done by organizations that were done at the time that section 15 was brought into law. Statutory audits were done to go through the statutes of Canada, Ontario, British Columbia and Manitoba, which pointed out case after case after case of discriminatory effect in legislation. With respect, I think that opinion is unfounded.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Marsden. The last person on my list is Senator Bosa. Senator Bosa, I must remind you of the clock. At six o'clock I have no choice under the rules other than to rise. Please be brief.

Senator Bosa: I appreciate the generosity of my colleagues in giving me two whole minutes to put my questions.

Senator Frith: Don't mention it!

Senator Bosa: I wonder if I understood the witnesses correctly when they stated that they want to see sections 15 and 28 of the Charter of Rights inserted in section 16 of the Accord, and if they are aware that the ethnocultural communities have grave reservations about this section. Notwithstanding the fact that section 27 is included in here, they do not feel that they have the same protection that they would have had prior to the introduction of this Accord.

Ms. Atcheson: We made our position clear, to say at the very least, that section 16 is a Pandora's box. We do not know why it is there. We have heard a number of reasons from the government about why it is there, though. It troubles all of the equality-seeking groups not only because the way it is currently worded it seems to suggest a hierarchy of rights, that some groups are more protected than others, but, more fundamentally, because it is difficult to predict what it actually means. What does "affect" actually mean, that these rights or clauses will not be "affected" by the Accord? It is not a standard with which we have any legal familiarity.

We would be pleased to sit down and discuss with the government all of the aspects around section 15, including the ones that you have raised. We have not been prepared to say, "Take it out," because to say "Take it out" arguably would take some protection away from groups that have it already. Our approach has been to say, "Augment it," or, alternatively, "Let's talk about a whole other approach to the drafting of the Accord, given what the government appears to want to achieve."

The Chairman: We have reached the time when I will have to either call the committee to rise or end the questioning.

I am sorry. There are no doubt many more questions that we could ask you. We thank you very much for coming to be with us today and sharing your views.

[Translation]

You have been a great help to our committee. On behalf of all my colleagues, I thank you.

[English]

Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, March 23, 1988.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 2818)

TEXT OF THE ADDRESS OF MR. JEAN-GUY LEGAULT, PRESIDENT OF THE EDOUARD-MONTPETIT FOUNDATION, AT THE PRESENTATION OF THE EDOUARD-MONTPETIT MEDAL
TO SENATOR ARTHUR TREMBLAY ON
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1988

March 2, 1988 will remain one of the most memorable days in the history of the Édouard-Montpetit Foundation. We are, at this very moment, writing an immortal page of history. And it is indeed an historic moment, this evening, when the Speaker of the Senate, Senator Guy Charbonneau, bids us welcome to the Senate of Canada.

The Foundation's Trustees are most grateful to the Speaker of the Senate for generously agreeing to preside over the presentation of the Montpetit Medal in the Senate's Red Chamber to Senator Arthur Tremblay, in the presence of members of the Senate, the House of Commons and other guests.

The Trustees are aware of the very important role played by the Senate since the Fathers of Confederation established this honourable chamber in 1867. Canada became what it is today because through the years senators and members of the House of Commons have worked with great dedication to help build this country with their fellow citizens.

We are delighted to have this opportunity today to take an active part in this award ceremony. By paying tribute to one of your number, honourable senators, we are honouring you as well, on both sides of this chamber.

A former Prime Minister of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald, said in referring to the Senate: "It is indeed a Chamber of reflection". Much has been written about the Senate and Senate reform, but the conclusion is always that the Senate should continue to exist.

In 1920 the man whom His Eminence Cardinal Jean-Marie Rodrigue Villeneuve named as one of the five most important initiators of change in French Canada, established, at the request and with the blessing of Monsignor Georges Gauthier, a school of social, economic and political science for young French Canadians.

With the help of his contemporaries, this forerunner of the Quiet Revolution started the school which was to become part of the university later on. It was to provide a focus and stimulus for professionals in various fields, for journalism, diplomacy, and later on economics, social science, tourism, labour relations, and so forth.

Édouard Montpetit, a defender of women's rights who was ahead of his time, knew that French Canada needed an elite and that this elite must include men of action. It meant that the school had to open broader horizons and explore new avenues.

We remember that for thirty years, Édouard Montpetit was Secretary General of the University of Montreal. With tremendous dedication he made the University of Montreal known throughout the world. We are reminded of the words of tribute spoken by the President of La Presse, Mr. Roger D. Landry, on June 18, 1984, when he too received this important award, and I quote: "This mission was to convince the public that economics was important as a philosophy and as a science, a concept he carried with him throughout his life". Mr. Landry went on to say: "...he dedicated his life to this mission. And today we see the results in the status Quebec has achieved in the business world, in finance and economics. We see the importance of economics as a discipline in our institutions. A monument has been erected to his memory opposite the University of Montreal, but there is another monument, a living monument that today rises on the foundation he himself laid down."

He was often asked by the Canadian Government to represent Canada abroad by giving lectures on Canada at the Sorbonne, in Brussels and elsewhere.

A biography of Pierre Péladeau, President of Quebecor Inc., includes several pages where we read the speech made by M. Péladeau on December 1, 1985, upon receiving the Montpetit Medal, and I quote: "This is a great honour, because I have always admired him. As we all know, he was energetic and fearless, and today, his ideas are as modern and lucid as they were at the time. Édouard Montpetit had some rare and very accurate insights about his people, its situation in the world and how its economy should be directed ... Back from France and steeped in law and literature, he said that he came back to his country like a colonist. He felt it was imperative to examine its economy, but lacked the scientific infrastructure on which such investigations could be based. Nevertheless, he had the courage and indeed the temerity to establish the School of Social and Political Science, together with his collaborators".

Through his writings and his books, his lectures and his personal life, Édouard Montpetit sent us a message of hope by leading us along this path. He said proudly: "I have confidence in the destiny of my country." Since 1911, his major concern was international relations. He insisted to anyone who would listen that Canada's economic future would depend on its borders being sufficiently open to the movement of capital and goods. This great economist had a very progressive view of our future. In his book "Sous le signe de l'Or", Montpetit insisted: "First open the borders: allow for free movement of persons and goods ...", always of course in accordance with the laws of the country.

Already in 1941, Édouard Montpetit emphasized the importance of accepting the Canadian situation, and he believed in a Canada where our two cultures could develop together. He had always alerted young French Canadians to the problems that were important in this country.

His faith in the future has since been vindicated. On November 8, 1945, forty-four years ago, the Édouard Montpetit Foundation was established. Its purpose was to perpetuate the name of this great French Canadian and to promote the advancement of social sciences by granting scholarships and by creating the Édouard Montpetit Award which is given once a year to a deserving student selected by a jury. Finally, the Board of Directors, on recommendation of a jury, awards the Édouard Montpetit Medal of Excellence to individuals who have played a role in one of the fields pioneered by our founder.

As a posthumous tribute to our founder, Édouard Montpetit, let us recall the following words included in "Présences", a veritable song of the Earth: "Look at the world around us. Let yourself be impregnated by the essence of creatures and things. Become increasingly familiar with the realities of your country. You will learn to know what your country means. Once we know what our country means to us, we will begin to love that country. We will make our mark on its soil and sing its praises in our work. We will seek its challenges and distill the essence of a CANADIAN FRIENDSHIP that will keep and preserve our patriotism. Our culture is our strength. We will keep that culture and make it a national strength. Our language and our spirit will reflect that strength, both reflecting our culture as plants reflect the vigour of the earth."

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR ARTHUR TREMBLAY

It is with heart-felt emotion today that we trustees of the Édouard-Montpetit Foundation, in the Red Chamber of the Canadian Senate, want to pay tribute and express gratitude to the Honourable Senator Arthur Tremblay for the role he played in education in Quebec, and in the constitutional field in the Senate in Ottawa.

In a few minutes, as President of the Foundation I will have the distinguished honour to present the Édouard-Montpetit award of excellence to this outstanding academic, to this Canadian senator who has devoted his life to serve the Canadian and Quebec communities.

Senator, you belong to this very active generation of people who have given the best of themselves to serve this human community to which we all belong. Whether it was at Quebec City's Laval University with the Very Reverend Georges-Henri Lévesque and all the other brave soldiers who were then at the university; whether at the Department of Education of the belle province of Quebec; whether in Canada's Upper Chamber with all your Canadian Senate colleagues, you and your team mates led the good fight to build this great country, this great Canada.

In a few minutes you will be joining the prestigious group of Canadians who have been awarded the Édouard-Montpetit Medal: then Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau, the Very Reverend Georges-Henri Lévesque, His Excellency D'Iberville Fortier, the late Justice André Montpetit, Pierre Péladeau, Roger-D. Landry, Mr. Justice Albert Mayrand, Pierre Laurin, Roger Charbonneau, the Honourable Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, Germaine Cornez, McGill's Paul-André Crépeau, Paul Lacoste, and the late Roger Duhamel.

With so many outstanding achievements to your credit—and the selfless support of your charming wife who has always been by your side, as she would be—you certainly deserve the Édouard-Montpetit Medal. Senator Tremblay, the leading role you played in all these fields eloquently attests to your qualifications.

Arthur Tremblay, member of the Senate, please accept this award of excellence for everything you have done in our homeland of Quebec and in this Canadian land, as well as this honorary degree in appreciation for what you have done for your fellow citizens and for the economic development of French Canadians.

Senator, your commitment, your dedication and your humanitarian spirit have always conveyed a message of pride, a message of love and hope to all your fellow Canadians and your fellow Quebecers. To you we say: Ad multos annos. May you have many more years of dedication and service to the people of Canada. You are following in the footsteps of Montpetit, the mentor of an entire generation.

(The text of the remarks of the Speaker of the Senate and of the Honourable Arthur Tremblay appears on pages 3820 and 2821 of Debates of the Senate, Thursday, March 3, 1988.)

NOTICE OF DEATH

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is with deep regret that I have to inform the Senate of the death of our colleague, Senator Yvette Rousseau, who passed away this morning in Montreal's Saint-Luc Hospital.

In remembrance, I ask all honourable senators to stand and observe one minute of silence.

The members of the Senate then stood in silent tribute.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to tradition, we shall adjourn immediately. Before doing so, I would like to give the following details: visitors may pay homage in Montreal, tomorrow, March 18, from 2 p.m. to 10 p.m. at Urgel Bourgie funeral home, 5650 Côtes des Neiges Road, then, on Saturday and Sunday, March 19 and 20, from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. and from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m., and also on Monday, March 21, at 11 a.m., at the Coopérative de l'Estrie funeral home, 1011, Galt Street West, in Sherbrooke.

The funeral service will be held on Monday, March 21, at 2 p.m., in Sherbrooke's Cathedral.

Donations to the Yvette Rousseau Fund, University of Quebec in Montreal, 385 Sherbrooke Street East, Suite 850, H2X 1E3, care of Mr. Pierre Parent, Director General, would be appreciated by the family.

Senators will have an opportunity to pay tribute to Senator Rousseau on Tuesday next, March 22.

THE LATE HONOURABLE YVETTE ROUSSEAU

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to say a few words and pay tribute to the memory of our colleague Senator Yvette Rousseau.

First, for your benefit I might recall a few biographical notes. She was born in Quebec's Kamouraska County. She was married in 1935 and is the mother of eight children.

She was educated at the École normale of the Sisters of the Holy Rosary in Rimouski; in 1964 she received a degree in economics from the Labour College of Canada. She also took economics at the University of Sherbrooke.

She first worked as an elementary school teacher in 1934. In 1948 she returned to work to provide a source of income for the family after her husband became disabled as a result of illness. She took a new job in 1952 when her family moved to Coaticook.

After 1952 she became involved in the labour movement. In 1953 she was elected vice-president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the first woman elected as a labour executive, a position she held for five years.

Her activities took her outside the trade union field, and she took a liking to the various aspects of community life. From 1967 to 1972 she was in charge of customer education at Sherbrooke's regional union of the Caisses populaires Desjardins.

Senator Rousseau was deeply involved in women's issues. I should think that several of my colleagues will have more to say about that aspect of her life and of her career which was so important to her, to Canadian women generally, and to Canada as a whole.

During her life, Senator Rousseau received many distinguished awards. In 1955, she received the Bene-Merenti medal for her work in the labour movement.

In 1973, a prize bearing her name was established. The Prix Yvette Rousseau is a literary distinction awarded annually to women whose works focus on the family, individual rights and responsibilities, women at work and education. Senator Rousseau was honorary president.

Her belief in a united Canada was profound, witness the following passage from her maiden speech in the Senate on April 15, 1980. Before quoting from her speech, however, I would like to stress one aspect of her career which made a tremendous impression on me. I am referring to the "yes" or "no" question during the referendum on sovereignty-association. Some of us may recall that militants who supported the "yes" campaign said as a form of ridicule, that Quebec's "Yvettes" were in favour of the "no" option. The name "Yvette" was used as a put-down.

At a meeting advertised as the "Rallye des Yvette", Senator Rousseau stood up in front of a large crowd and said: "Yes, the 'Yvettes' are in favour of the 'no' option. My name is Yvette and I am for Canada and against the separation of Quebec." This was typical of her whole life and the way she could turn a negative situation into a positive one. Her role in this struggle for a united Canada reflected the lifelong support she gave this cause.

I would now like to quote from her first speech here in the Senate:

I believe that Canada is not only a matter of federal or provincial programs or jurisdiction. I always believed that it is possible to unite the ten provinces and territories for the benefit of everyone and that the best way to do it was and will be, our federative system, until proven otherwise.

Many years ago, when I was a young teacher in small rural schools of the lower St. Lawrence I was proud to teach and explain the motto of Canada, not only the meaning of the Latin words A mari usque ad mare but particularly that they mean more than the literal translation. I hope that the same things were taught in the schools of all other provinces and that today the real meaning of our motto is still explained to children even more forcefully.

Honourable senators, to get back to the subject of "yes" or "no"—

[English]

—if it had been up to us to decide whether or not Senator Rousseau should stay with us for many more years, and were the question asked, "Shall she leave us?", our answer would have been a resounding "No!" Yvette Rousseau played a very important role in Canadian life and certainly in the Senate. We are all very proud of her, and we shall truly miss her, as will our fellow Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it was with considerable emotion that we learned of the passing of our dear colleague Senator Yvette Rousseau.

As of the moment she was appointed to the Senate, Senator Rousseau gained the respect of each and every one of us.

During these many years, we had ample opportunity to appreciate her dedication and selflessness. She demonstrated these qualities at every step of her career. She was both a great Quebecer and a great Canadian. She was the living proof that it is possible to base a public career on essentially human qualities.

Senator Rousseau had exerted her influence in several areas of activities. Actively involved in the labour movement, she had first assumed the duties of Vice-President of the Canadian Federation of Textile Workers, and then those of Vice-President of the National Trade Unions. In 1953, she wrote a book on night work by women in factories. As Senator Frith pointed out earlier, Senator Rousseau was a founding member of the Fédération des femmes du Québec and President of the Quebec Council on the Status of Women and also a founding member of the Quebec University in Montreal.

She was a member of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce as well as a life member of the Sherbrooke branch of the "Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste".

We can all bear witness to the dedication and humanity of this great lady. Moreover, she knew how to present her ideas with conviction, but without dogmatism. I remember her interventions while we were sitting together on the Joint Committee on Official Languages and, more recently, during the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitutional Agreement, 1987.

I think that we can state outright that Senator Yvette Rousseau assumed to perfection the role envisioned by the Fathers of Confederation for senators, that of lucid and clear-minded, yet faithful guardians of the will of the elected.

I had several opportunities to get to know Senator Rousseau better on parliamentary delegations to Europe. Her warm personality enriched those trips, both on a professional and on a human level. She was a worthy representative of her province, our country and this assembly.

I went to the funeral of our colleague yesterday in Sherbrooke with many senators, members of the House of Commons, Ministers and former Federal and Provincial Ministers, as well as many friends and colleagues of Senator Rousseau.

The large number of people at the funeral reflected both the respect people felt for her and her deep involvement in the community.

To all the members of her family, her many friends and her colleagues opposite, I would like to offer my deepest sympathy and that of the government.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to join Senators Frith and Murray in paying homage to my colleague and friend Senator Yvette Rousseau. We both came to the Senate at the same time without knowing exactly what our role would be as senators.

She sometimes showed me by her example things that I was not always able to put into practice, such as the ability to listen and to understand.

As a parliamentarian, I went on many trips with Senator Rousseau. We often discussed the problems of the less fortunate and educated people whom she had come to know so well as a union worker and whom I had the opportunity to get to know because of my work.

She was a mother, in charge of raising eight children, and this in more ways than one as her husband was an invalid. As a result of many sacrifices, she was able to give an education to her eight children.

I remember most vividly a trip I went on with her to Palestine, Judea and Egypt, and especially the part when we hitchhiked on the West Bank to get a better idea of how the people lived there. We needed someone like Yvette Rousseau on that trip.

As she had eight children and I have 10 myself, we used to talk about our family problems and the successes and failures of our children. I had the privilege of attending her funeral yesterday and I would have gone even on foot. I had an opportunity to meet her four sons and four daughters, and I found in them all the best qualities of their mother.

On behalf of my colleagues, I would like to offer my most sincere condolences to the sons and daughters of Yvette Rousseau.

[English]

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I rise to pay tribute to the memory of our colleague, the late Senator Yvette Rousseau—a wife, a mother and a widow, who continued to work, to study, to teach and to lead on many fronts throughout her life. I got to know Senator Rousseau shortly after our arrival in the Senate, as both of us appeared on the first Selection Committee of the Governor General's Persons Case annual awards. I appreciated very much her depth of feeling and consideration for women who had made significant contributions without the opportunity for formal education in earlier times.

A representative of Les Cercles de Fermières of Quebec phoned to express that organization's sense of loss of a wonderful friend. I quote:

We could always count on her advice on women's issues. It was a pleasure to have her as guest speaker at various functions.

Senator Rousseau authored a book on night work by women in factories. Les Cercles joined with several other women's organizations in Quebec to develop a competition to encourage women to express themselves in writing. It was named "Le prix Yvette Rousseau".

I quote Yolande Calvé of Maniwaki: "Yvette Rousseau's life was an example to women in Quebec."

May I reiterate that quotation and say that Yvette Rousseau's life as a senator is an example to the women in the Canadian Senate. I wish to offer my condolences and feelings of deepest sympathy to the members of her family. I know that we all feel a sense of loss.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to join with colleagues in expressing sympathy to the family of Yvette Rousseau and the sense of loss that we all feel at her passing. She was a companion in the Senate and in many other causes; and, as others have said, she was a model for many women in Canada, especially women active in support of feminist causes.

Long before she became a member of the Senate she was widely known and admired among members of the union movement in Canada and among women activists. She had gained both respect and affection from so many of us because she had done all of the hard things herself. She had worked the night shifts; she had worked in the textile industry; she had taught; she had organized; and she had fought for all kinds of rights, particularly women's rights, and for universal social programs.

From early on in her life to the very end of her life she stuck by those causes, and her work was recognized by the many honours bestowed on her long before she became a member, a leader and president of a number of organizations, and a member of the Senate.

Her work on the advisory councils on the status of women, both in the province of Quebec and nationally, was another example of her leadership—a leadership which stood out because it was practised with such wisdom, such sensitivity and understanding of the issues, such restraint, and, at the same time, such great determination to make progress.

Senator Frith has referred to her role in the referendum battle. I will not repeat what he said, but I went to the “Yvette” rally in Montreal and saw that memorable evening, that incredible moment in Canadian history, and the important role she played in that, not only symbolically—partly because of her name and because of how well she was known—but also in the organization. It really was a memorable demonstration of the spirit of Quebec women, shared by all Canadian women; and, in many ways, she symbolized that sensitivity and feeling more than anyone else.

The women of Canada, and therefore all Canadians, have gained a great deal from her life and work; and, as a feminist, as a past President of the National Action Committee, as well as her junior colleague in the Senate, I would like to count myself among one of the great multitude of admirers who feel that we have lost a very great friend, a very great role model. We will miss her very much indeed.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, it is not without emotion that again I extend the condolences I offered yesterday to the children and family of Senator Rousseau, and that I join my Senate colleagues who today are paying tribute to the memory of our colleague.

First I do so as Chairman of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, for she was among our most assiduous and committed members. I do so for the committee members who met this morning and urged me to speak on their behalf this afternoon. Senator Rousseau of course took part in the consideration of bills which now and then had been referred to our committee. Warm-hearted and serenely determined as she was, her main preoccupation was to help draft the reports on child benefits which our committee tabled in the Senate. Again recently, barely a month and a half ago, she agreed to sit on the sub-committee established by the Senate to study issues related to day care.

I would also like to pay tribute to Senator Rousseau as a former colleague from Quebec in this house. On that matter, I think I can state that beyond and despite different political persuasions, we had common perceptions, genuine agreement in diagnosing this federation's problems. This did not always lead to the same conclusions when it came to choosing a specific option. But the possibility for dialogue was always there. An open, frank and forthright dialogue. A dialogue where we could share the question marks, sometimes the concerns as to the Quebecers' conditions and future.

In some circumstances, as those in the Joint Special Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the 1987 Constitutional Agreement, set up after to the so-called Meech Lake and Langevin agreements, in such circumstances it even happened that we put our signatures in the column of those who, at the conclusion of the committee's work, adopted the committee report. Not everyone on the committee did that, but on that occasion Senator Rousseau and myself and those who shared that view came to the conclusion that in the circumstances, the committee report was worthwhile and should be approved.

Clearly, because of her previous experiences within the family as a mother and in the fields of teaching, a profession we both shared, of union work and women's advancement, Senator Rousseau brought to the Senate a special contribution not only because of her lucid insights, but also and foremost because of her human quality, the genuine humanism that obviously coloured and deeply motivated all her actions.

That human quality, that humanism were not of an abstract or speculative nature—rather, they were rooted in everyday experience, an experience that required a lot of courage, and may I say without false shame a lot of generous love in order to go through the situations she was exposed to during her lifetime.

In that respect, I feel I am not out of place when referring in this house to what the eldest of her children recalled yesterday at her funeral mass. During the last moments when they could still talk to each other, that daughter told her mother: “Mommy, you loved us a lot”. And the mother whispered: “Yes, all equally”.

• (1420)

Admirable words that totally expressed what Mrs. Rousseau was in the bottom of her heart. Wonderful words that both shed light on and reflect the hope expressed in the liturgical formula: “Requiescat in pace”. May she rest in peace, in the hope of resurrection and eternal bliss.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I too wish to remember a friend, Yvette Rousseau, who, as other senators have said, was also a mentor to me in this place. She was one of the first who, upon my arrival, came to see me to offer her support and her help, both in this place and in our caucus.

Other senators have outlined the outstanding and wide-ranging contribution Senator Rousseau has made in her life—in the women's movement, and in the union movement in Quebec. I too remember one of the highlights when she gave voice to the "No" side in the Quebec referendum with passion and conviction, and with that tremendous elegance which was her style.

Quebec was her province and her home; Canada was her country and her work place. It was not so long ago that she came to me and said, "I am doing a speaking tour in western Canada. What can I do for you? Would you like me to speak to some Franco-Albertans?" Of course, I agreed. She was wise and sensitive, a very great and grand woman who will be sincerely missed.

I offer my deepest sympathy and condolences to her family.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I also wish to join with my colleagues on this sad occasion. Sad is the occasion because we have lost a great Canadian.

The Senate has lost a devoted senator. It is deliberately that I use the French term "sénateur" because I well remember that when the time came to change the rules of this institution, Mrs. Rousseau mentioned to me that she preferred that term to the term "sénatrice". And the French version of our rules still refers to that title.

We have all lost a friend. I was fortunate enough, a little while after I arrived here, to convince her to be part of one parliamentary association over which I was presiding then, namely the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I was fortunate, since her help proved to be priceless. She was always on time, ready to work, well informed and devoted to the work of the institution. But we who work here do not always perceive the influence of a lady like Yvette Rousseau. When we travelled with her here in Canada as well as abroad we constantly met people that had had contacts with Yvette Rousseau.

I want to share with you what a group of women from my own province of Manitoba said on that occasion. That statement is all the more meaningful since Manitoba was neither her native province nor a region where she had special links, but it shows how deeply she had moved those women who wrote:

A great lady has gone. She left us quietly, softly, with her usual discretion and nobility. A great lady has just passed away. But she left with us all her love for Canada, her concern for the humble, her determination against injustice, her dedication to her work, her Christian charity and her innate sense of responsibility.

Yvette Boucher-Rousseau, this great lady, whose heart beat in unison with her country, leaves an imperishable memory with us, that of a woman with a keen sense of humour and the spirit of a fighter, a worthy daughter of her predecessors who made Canada a good place to live and a country of freedoms.

Yvette Boucher-Rousseau never ceased her struggle to improve Canadian women's condition. This teacher who had given birth to eight children shared the life of women working in the textile industry, in order to better understand their problems and better grasp the difficulties and obstacles facing these exploited women. Outraged by their work conditions, she initiated a union, organized female workers and struggled fervently for the recognition of their rights.

As first vice-president of the C.S.N., she kept fighting to achieve equality, not fortuitous equality but a responsible equality, one that brings results.

To that effect, she insisted that women needed a very precious means: education. As she used to say, "Education is the key to success in society". Just like the prophet, she did not hesitate to travel extensively, bringing the truth to the remotest localities such as in Yukon, British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

She also wanted women to attain self-sufficiency. But she wanted them to be really and truly self-sufficient, as she had been. This is why she was so interested in day care.

Because of the way she saw Canada and because of her political intuition, she was able to do great things.

Because of her conscientious and perfectionist nature, she aptly represented Canada wherever she was sent by the government. She gained respect and recognition for her keen knowledge of social issues.

A great woman is no more . . . but she has shown the way and we must build on what she has left behind.

She has left us a legacy of hope, love and determination.

THE LATE HONOURABLE RICHARD A. BELL, P.C., Q.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, may I have a moment of your time to express the sadness that all of us who knew the Honourable Richard A. Bell feel at his passing this weekend?

Dick Bell was associated for more than half a century, in this city and in this country, with the work of the Conservative Party. While he was an eminent member of the bar of Ontario and a distinguished lawyer, many of us knew him best in the many political capacities he filled for many years here in Ottawa. He had been a ministerial assistant in the Bennett government of the 1930s. Later, he was a national organizer, national director, of the Conservative Party. A dynamic figure, he helped to maintain the Conservative Party and to motivate Conservative supporters across the country through the years in opposition and especially during the war years. His was a very large talent for politics and public life and an even larger devotion to the traditions of his party, his province and his country.

In expressing my sympathy and that of the government to his family, we celebrate with them the tremendous contribution that he made, through the Conservative Party, to politics, to public life and to Canada—a contribution that has made it possible for later generations of Conservatives to serve in governments in Ottawa and at Queen's Park.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will understand if I emphasize other aspects of the important contribution Dick Bell made to Canada than those underlined by the Leader of the Government.

I remember Dick Bell well as a lawyer. He was, as Senator Murray has said, highly regarded in the profession and he played as eminent a role as a lawyer as we are told he played in the ranks of the Conservative Party. He was popular with his colleagues but, as was evidenced by his political success, he was also popular with his clients and his constituents. Lawyers seldom, if ever, top the popularity polls. Dick Bell had that combination of professional responsibility and skill that earned him a high reputation and affection among his colleagues and among the public.

He earned the respect his memory will enjoy for his role as a parliamentarian and as a Canadian citizen who made a great contribution to public life.

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 22, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, your Committee recommends that Rule 106 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended to read as follows:

"106. Seats shall be reserved without the Bar of the Senate Chamber for former members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons who may desire to hear the debates."

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 22, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, your Committee recommends that Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by striking out paragraph (d) and substituting the following:

"(d) the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations to which shall be appointed eight senators."

Your Committee further recommends that a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with this House for the purpose of changing the name of the present Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Scrutiny to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF TURKISH NATIONALS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(2), I give notice that later this day, I will call the attention of the Senate to the fate of 1,500 Turkish nationals threatened with deportation from Canada.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT ON FARM FINANCE EXTENDED

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That, notwithstanding the order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, 15th December, 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which was authorized to examine Farm Finance, be empowered to present its report no later than Thursday, April 28, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, as some senators may know, a notice has been issued calling the next meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee for 6 o'clock tomorrow, Wednesday, to consider the second draft of the committee's report. Unfortunately, there is a conflict. The National Finance Committee informs us that the Deputy Prime Minister is scheduled to appear before them at 6 o'clock tomorrow evening.

Accordingly, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at five o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, 23rd March, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF COMMITTEE'S FINAL REPORT ON DOCUMENT ENTITLED "A STUDY TEAM REPORT TO THE TASK FORCE ON PROGRAM REVIEW (NIELSEN TASK FORCE)— SERVICE TO THE PUBLIC—VETERANS" EXTENDED

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology which was authorized by the Senate to examine and report upon the document entitled: "A Study Team Report to the Task Force on Program Review (Nielsen Task Force)—Service to the Public—Veterans", dated May 1985, tabled in the Senate on 12th March, 1986, and also matters arising from the report as well as any subjects of interest to the present and future requirements of Canada's veterans, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report which was previously extended from 1st September, 1987, to no later than 31st March, 1988, be further extended to no later than 31st March, 1989.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR 1988 CROP YEAR

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he advise when the government intends to announce the initial prices that will be paid by the Canadian Wheat Board for the 1988 crop? There is a long-standing practice whereby the government makes this announcement early in March, although last year it was not made until sometime later on in April. In any event, it is useful for farmers to have this information early in March so that they can make their seeding and other management plans accordingly.

Inasmuch as there has been a marked improvement in the price on the Chicago Board of Trade, which is also reflected in the international price structures, I am wondering if we could have that announcement soon from the government.

If the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not have that information with him today, perhaps he would make some inquiries with respect to it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask for a report on that matter from my colleague responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two questions, both asked by Senator Bonnell. The first is with respect to Toxic Mussels—Progress of Research; and the second is with respect to the Environment—Effect of Pollution from Sunken Vessel "Irving Whale". I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FISHERIES

TOXIC MUSSELS—PROGRESS OF RESEARCH

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 10, 1988, by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding Fisheries—Toxic Mussels—Progress of Research.

(The answer follows:)

A team of researchers from various federal departments including the National Research Council cooperated on the identification of the toxin, which was believed to have been the cause of the reported poisonings. The toxin was identified on December 18, 1987, as domoic acid, a natural toxin associated with a certain type of seaweed.

Since January 6, 1988, several areas have been reopened for harvesting of molluscs following the establishment of an expanded monitoring program, which is being maintained to provide continuous assurance of product quality from all cleared areas.

With respect to Prince Edward Island, the area within a straight line between East Point and Cape Bear, with the exception of the Cardigan River system, has been reopened for harvesting on February 16, 1988. This area represents most of eastern P.E.I.

Mussels, clams, oysters and quahogs now in the Canadian consumer market fully meet health and safety requirements.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EFFECT OF POLLUTION FROM SUNKEN VESSEL "IRVING WHALE"

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 10, 1988 by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding The Environment—Prince Edward Island—Effect of Pollution From Sunken Vessel "Irving Whale".

(The answer follows:)

Since September 1970, the oil barge "Irving Whale" has been resting in 68.6 metres of water in the Gulf of St Lawrence, 55 kilometers northeast of East Point, P.E.I.

In 1977, detailed surveys indicated that approximately 2,500 tonnes of Bunker C oil remained on-board the vessel.

Surface surveys are carried out twice a year by the Canadian Coast Guard.

In 1985, Environment Canada, with the assistance of the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of National Defence inspected the wreck using an unmanned submersible. The survey indicated that the barge remained intact with only minor leakage of oil.

On December 10, 1987, the latest surface survey conducted by the Canadian Coast Guard ship "Narwhal" found no trace of oil at the site. Another survey is planned for this spring.

At this time, no research is being done to assess the impact of oil escaping from the barge. The small amounts of oil observed are not anticipated to pose a threat to the marine environment.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

SECRETARY OF STATE

WOMEN'S PROGRAM BUDGET

Question No. 40 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden.

10th December, 1987—With respect to the Women's Program of the Secretary of State (i) why will its budget be frozen at $12.9 million a year for the next five years; (ii) why would that budget not rise at least with the rate of inflation; and (iii) why is it considered that the 1986-87 budget of $12.9 million was sufficient to carry out the work of the Women's Program, which serves over fifty per cent of the population of Canada?

Reply by the Secretary of State of Canada:

(i) and (iii) Over the last 5 years, the budget of the Women's Program has increased 300 per cent from $4.2 million in 1983-84 to $12.9 million in 1987-88. There are other departments involved in providing financial assistance to organizations working on women's issues which fall within their mandates, including Health and Welfare, Justice, Solicitor General and Employment and Immigration. The Women's Program is not the sole funding source for all issues of concern to women.

(ii) With the renewal of the Women's Program, greater emphasis will be given to working cooperatively with mainstream institutions to integrate women's equality issues into their mandates. This should result in a greater contribution by these organizations to the achievement of equality for Canadian women. In addition, the government is committed in renewing the Women's Program to introducing multi-year operational funding. This practice will enable women's organizations to undertake long term planning and ensure greater stability.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-76, to provide for emergency preparedness and to make a related amendment to the National Defence Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us now, Bill C-76, is part of a package introduced by the government in response to some of the findings and recommendations of the so-called "Nielsen Task Force" on program review.

The package consists of Bill C-76 and Bill C-77. Bill C-76, the Emergency Preparedness Bill, is an organization bill intended to give a statutory basis to the organization called Emergency Preparedness Canada or EPC.

Bill C-77, the Emergencies Act, is the other part of the package. It is designed to replace the War Measures Act and implements a commitment by this and the previous government to put in place a more appropriate, flexible and fully safeguarded system to respond to grave national emergencies.

I am grateful to say, honourable senators, that Bill C-76 is far more simple and straightforward than Bill C-77: In essence it seeks parliamentary confirmation of the status quo—the establishment and operation of Emergency Preparedness Canada.

EPC's job has been—and under this legislation will continue to be—the coordination of planning at the federal level and consultation with the provinces to develop and implement plans to respond to a host of potential civil emergencies in Canada.

Before getting into the substance of Bill C-76, allow me to recount a little of the background to Emergency Preparedness Canada and to this bill. Under the so-called "emergency doctrine", the federal government may take actions to meet an emergency in areas that would ordinarily come within the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces. This doctrine has been upheld most recently by the Supreme Court of Canada in the anti-inflation reference.

It follows logically, therefore, that if the federal government is to respond quickly and effectively, it cannot simply react ad hoc to individual situations, but must have at the ready policies and mechanisms to deal with emergencies.

As early as 1948, largely in response to the perceived threat from nuclear weapons, a civil defence organization was set up within the Department of National Defence and remained within that department until 1951. In 1951 the organization was moved to National Health and Welfare.

In 1957, a second emergency planning organization, known as "Emergency Measures Canada" or "EMO", was set up in the Privy Council Office. Its essential role was to ensure continuity of government in the event of a nuclear attack. As you can see from the bill now before us, "continuity of government" remains a major task of the emergency preparedness establishment.

In 1959, a major reorganization took place whereby the civil defence organization in the Department of Health and Welfare was merged with emergency measures in the PCO and thus became the single focus for coordinating all civil aspects of defence policy.

In 1966, the EMO's mandate went through a subtle, but important, shift. Pursuant to a decision of the Pearson cabinet, EMO was given the added responsibility for coordinating the federal government's response to any peacetime disaster.

From 1968 to 1984 the function shifted back and forth between the Privy Council Office and the Department of National Defence. Since 1984, the minister responsible for EPC has been, as well, the Minister of National Defence.

[Senator Kelly]

Since July 1, 1986 the organization has been known as "Emergency Preparedness Canada".

Since 1981, the role of EPC and the federal government's emergency planning in general has been set by an Order-in-Council known as the "Emergency Planning Order". The bill before us today is designed, among other things, to replace that order.

● (1500)

I must emphasize that all of the organizational and mandate changes since 1948 to which I have referred were undertaken pursuant to cabinet or prime ministerial fiat and not pursuant to any legislation. Bill C-76, then, is designed to give a legislative underpinning to the current structure and mandate of EPC.

Honourable senators, I want to stress that our review of this legislation is not just a rubber stamp—it is not just a post facto approval of the status quo. Bill C-76 is a significant initiative because it provides a statutory base to this important function.

By formally recognizing the structure and mandate of EPC, we will also be providing it with the much needed credibility and stature to work with and coordinate up to 11 federal departments and agencies which may be involved in an emergency response.

I would like to remind you briefly what EPC does. EPC is responsible for coordinating the Government of Canada's response to emergencies—including war, insurrection, natural and man-made disasters—and for encouraging uniform and effective standards of preparedness across the country.

This role obviously requires extensive consultations with provincial authorities, with the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency and with NATO, relating to the civil side of alliance preparedness.

In practical terms, EPC has a situation centre in Ottawa from which it monitors emergencies all over Canada. Unless the emergency falls within federal jurisdiction, the Government of Canada will intervene only in response to a provincial request for assistance.

When the federal government responds to an emergency, it does so through the appropriate operating department. For example, National Health and Welfare would be the lead federal department for an emergency involving contagion or widespread injuries and Transport Canada would be the lead federal department for an emergency involving trains, ships or aircraft.

EPC, in itself, has no operational response capability. It plans, trains, tests, monitors and coordinates. Responding is left to individual operating departments under the control and direction of their respective ministers.

In 1985, the Federal Task Force on Program Review, the Nielsen task force, reviewed the role and operations of EPC. The report concluded that EPC was currently unable to perform its designated roles effectively, principally because it lacked the appropriate statutory authority. I believe it is fair to say that the Subcommittee on National Defence, chaired by Senator Lafond, reached roughly the same conclusions in its report tabled in May, 1983.

If passed by Parliament, Bill C-76 will simply take the current mandate of EPC, as defined by the emergency planning order, and give it a statutory base and bureaucratic clout. Because of that statutory base, EPC will finally have a mandate reviewed and granted by Parliament and, as a separate agency, EPC will provide a focus in the Estimates for the federal government's emergency preparedness policies and programs, including federal support for the provinces.

The list of functions that EPC carries out as part of its facilitating and coordinating role is set out in clause 5 of the bill. I believe these functions are largely self-explanatory and require no further comment from me at this time.

Honourable senators will not be surprised, I am sure, to know that one of the reasons I was pleased to be given the responsibility for this bill was that it relates to part of the study carried out by the Senate Special Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety. The report the committee tabled last year identified one area of concern that I think is germane to our review of Bill C-76.

Within the federal government there are a number of departments and agencies, each having some role or responsibility with respect to counter-terrorism: the RCMP, CSIS, External Affairs, Defence, the Privy Council Office, the CSE, Transport Canada, Immigration and so on.

Many of these organizations have their own "crisis management centres" or "operations rooms", so that each can respond quickly and effectively to terrorist and other incidents and emergencies falling within their jurisdiction.

The plethora of departments and agencies having some role in counter-terrorism policies, planning and operations obviously requires a coordinating mechanism. In the counter-terrorism case, the coordinator is the Solicitor General and his department. But the department is just that—a coordinator. It has, itself, no operational role or response capabilities.

This distribution of responsibilities—I am tempted to call it a "fragmentation of responsibilities", because I think that term is more accurate—caused the committee concern for several reasons.

First, we thought that it potentially obscured accountability and responsibility for actions and results. Where does the buck stop? To quote my eloquent colleague and fellow committee member, Senator Finlay MacDonald, "Who's in charge when the Vigoro hits the ventilator?"

Senator Frith: When what hits the ventilator?

Senator Kelly: When the Vigoro hits the ventilator.

Senator Frith: He is famous for his euphemisms, Senator MacDonald is.

Senator Kelly: It was an in camera meeting; perhaps I should not have referred to that remark publicly.

Second, we thought the extended and rather complicated lines of communication and authority could impede quick and effective responses to emergencies, and third, we worried about the coordinating role of the Solicitor General's department. As a "junior" department with no operational role, does it really have the clout to ensure the system works?

From testimony before the committee and by reviewing some previous terrorist incidents, I believe the committee had good reason to question whether some of the operating departments really recognized the coordinating role the Solicitor General's department is supposed to play.

I believe that the same issues and concerns are applicable to Emergency Preparedness Canada and to the structure of our system to respond to emergencies. Who is in charge? Are the lines of authority clear and "linear" enough? Does EPC have the "clout", in bureaucratic terms, to ensure that the system works?

Looking at the structure exclusively from the perspective of counter-terrorism or emergency preparedness, I would prefer that the coordination function be housed in the cabinet office under the direct authority of the Prime Minister, reporting, perhaps, through the cabinet committee on security and intelligence.

Incidentally, from 1974 to 1984—in fact, including the period that Senator Pitfield was secretary to the cabinet—the emergency preparedness function was housed in the Privy Council Office and was known as the national emergency planning establishment, or Emergency Planning Canada.

Locating the function in the cabinet office was recommended by General Dare in his review of federal emergency planning and response in the aftermath to the October Crisis in 1970. As is now well known—and as our colleagues Senators Kenny, Pitfield and Fairbairn can attest—the federal government's response to the October Crisis was coordinated, if not run, out of the PMO and the PCO, with the almost constant involvement of Prime Minister Trudeau and his senior cabinet colleagues and officials.

I recognize, however, that the Canadian Prime Minister is already overburdened in terms of the duties thrust upon him. We must avoid, therefore, the temptation to load all that is important, or faddish, or whatever, on the shoulders of the Prime Minister. To be effective, our Prime Minister need not be directly involved in everything, as long as he has the power to intervene in anything that he chooses.

Any Prime Minister would involve himself in an emergency of the magnitude of the October Crisis. I think it unrealistic, however, to expect our Prime Minister to involve himself directly and centrally in every one of the 60 or so types of emergencies that EPC is designed to handle.

We all know the adage: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

From everything that I have reviewed, the emergency planning function does not appear to have suffered since its move from the Privy Council Office. The Nielsen task force report, the special examination undertaken by the Auditor General last year, the performance and response during the tornado in Edmonton, and so on, indicate that EPC is doing rather well in this current configuration.

I note, however, that the designation of the minister responsible for EPC is an ad nominem designation, meaning that EPC will not necessarily report to a particular minister, such as the Minister of National Defence. The designation of the minister responsible, under this act, will be a prerogative of the Prime Minister.

I hope, therefore, that this and subsequent governments will keep an open mind on the location of EPC and will monitor EPC's performance. If it begins to slip and if that slippage appears due to any of the concerns I have identified, I hope that the government of the day will give serious consideration to returning the EPC function to the cabinet office.

Honourable senators, let me conclude by recommending Bill C-76 for passage.

A statutory base is required to give EPC leverage within the federal bureaucracy and with the provinces for civil emergency planning and coordination. Especially in view of the importance of the function being performed, I do not believe it wise to allow the current informal and ad hoc arrangement to persist.

I hope that Bill C-76 will be approved quickly. As we all know, an election is in the offing. Legislation to formalize EPC's status and mandate has been in the works for nearly 20 years. Having come this far, I would hope that this legislation would be passed before an election and not be held over for a new Parliament to handle, and, perhaps, to lose among new and more politically pressing priorities.

John F. Kennedy was quoted as having said that, in pursuit of the national purpose—

Too often a project is undertaken in the excitement of a crisis and then it begins to lose its appeal as the problems drag on and the bills pile up. But we must have the steadfastness to see every enterprise through.

I believe that Bill C-76 is an enterprise worth seeing through now. I characterize this bill as relatively routine but important legislation that responds to concerns expressed by this chamber and in other places for some time.

Honourable senators, I ask for the passage of Bill C-76.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Eighteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Final Report on the 1987-88 Main Estimates), presented in the Senate on March 15, 1988.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the National Finance Committee spent about a month studying the principle of comprehensive auditing within the federal government.

[Senator Kelly.]

Our goal was to assess the complexity of the matter and, if possible, to present findings and recommendations to auditors and users of government financial statements.

In brief, comprehensive auditing concerns government accountability. Parliament authorizes government to collect taxes and to make expenditures. In return, the government is accountable to Parliament for the use of these funds and Parliament, in turn, is accountable to the people of Canada.

To that effect, Parliament must receive from government, at regular intervals, a report on receipts and utilization of public funds. This report is subjected to a comprehensive audit consisting of three parts:

First, attesting of government financial statements;

Second, control of compliance with legislative authorities; and Third, value-for-money auditing.

Financial attesting and legislative compliance have been normal and accepted activities of any legislative auditor since 1878 in this country. Auditors have periodically reported on instances of waste, extravagance or unproductive use of public resources, so that value-for-money auditing became the next step. In the 1970s, a consensus was reached that value-for-money auditing should be made a formal responsibility of the Auditor General of Canada. This was incorporated into the Auditor General Act in 1977.

The generally accepted elements of value-for-money auditing are economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

Although the Auditor General is given responsibility to report on economy and efficiency, his role on effectiveness is limited to reporting on instances where satisfactory procedures are not in place to demonstrate it.

In theory, comprehensive auditing is easy to define and its criteria are clear-cut. We expect the auditor to ensure that the government's accounts are in order and that the law of the land is respected. In practice, we are not always sure to what extent we want the auditor to audit on a value-for-money basis and to report on his findings in this respect.

In the private sector, the final check on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the enterprise is profitability. Boards of directors do not call upon auditors to comment publicly on anything that might affect the profitability of their business. At board meetings, however, they do ask their auditors to report this information.

In the public sector, there is no profitability objective and there are no basic criteria. If the government is inefficient, it does not go bankrupt. It asks Parliament for more money. Parliament, however, can depend on the auditor, whose responsibility it is to report on value-for-money.

The report I tabled on March 15, 1988, emphasizes five major points. I would now like to give a brief description of these points and summarize the committee's conclusions.

In the first place, we had to arrive at a definition of effectiveness. We based ourselves on the principle that effectiveness in the broader sense should involve performance in general, and not only the degree of attainment of a program's goals. We discovered that in practice, and under the federal statutes, effectiveness is narrowly defined and there seems to be a clear distinction between economy and efficiency on the one hand, and effectiveness on the other.

We also learned that at the time of defining the criteria for assessing effectiveness in the broader sense, the perceptions of the client, usually government and Parliament, can vary significantly from those of the program's target persons or groups.

Unintentionally neglecting the interests of participants to a program can lead us to draw misleading and even erroneous conclusions on the program's effectiveness.

In the second place, we asked ourselves who was responsible for accounting for resource optimisation, and came to the conclusion that management should mainly be responsible for reporting to Parliament. We recognized however that all programs and activities do not easily lend themselves to that kind of audit and reporting. However, we recognized that Part III of the Estimates is the best place to provide the appropriate accounting information on that matter, but that presently this is not being done in a consistent way.

In the third place, we studied the terms of reference of the Auditor General of Canada. All witnesses feel that ideally, he should not report on resource optimization, but rather should limit himself to attesting to the accurateness of the reports submitted by management.

Further, it is clear, both for the committee and each and every one of the witnesses, including the Auditor General, that the latter's role is not to examine the appropriateness of policies. We however admit it is very difficult to draw the line between what is a policy decision and what is policy implementation.

Fourth, we considered the question of the link between value-for-money and legislative compliance. When governments establish programs with objectives that foster multi-year financial commitments, but with uncertain timing, those objectives may not be consistent with a system of annual appropriations; in short, achieving effectiveness may not be consistent with legislative compliance. That is precisely what we found out when we examined the overexpenditure of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion in this year's Supplementary Estimates (B).

And finally, fifth, we wondered about the time the Auditor General's report comes out, and we concluded that reports by the Auditor General on value-for-money could be more timely if they were not required annual reporting.

Such are the conclusions the committee made in its report, which I urge honourable senators to endorse because it is of vital interest to everybody. It has to do with responsibility, the very concept underlying our role as parliamentarians. Before concluding I should like to indicate that, since Senator Marsden wants to take part in the debate, I will be pleased to adjourn the debate in her name.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned in the name of Senator Marsden.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the thirty-third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (financial operation of committees), presented in the Senate on March 3, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this report has become annual and routine. It is the same as that agreed to for the last fiscal year. Its purpose is to allow the Internal Economy Committee to have a global idea of the budgetary requirements of Senate committees before recommending their approval to the Senate, and, in the meantime, to permit the various committees to have funds to operate until the end of June.

You will note on page 2012 of Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for March 3, 1988, that the substance of it is as follows:

your Committee be authorized to release no more than 3/12—

That takes us from the end of March 1988 until the end of June.

—of those approved funds until the end of June 1988.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF TURKISH NATIONALS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Hébert rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 22, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the fate of 1,500 Turkish nationals threatened with deportation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, as I speak to you in the calm of this chamber, 1,500 Turkish nationals who came to Canada about 18 months ago are going through anguish and despair after learning that the Department of Immigration has decided to deport them.

These last few days, I have spent many hours listening to their story and speaking in French with their children who, in 18 months, have had time to learn my language. I have met with their employers, who are stunned at the prospect of being deprived of excellent workers, and with their landlords and neighbours who are deeply saddened at the thought of losing such reliable tenants and warm friends. I have also spoken with Mrs. Diane Bélanger, who is acting as counsel for 400 Turks threatened with deportation, a remarkable woman who is so devoted to the cause of her unfortunate clients that she forgets to eat and sleep. Finally, I have spoken with Ismail Ozhan, a young man of 29, who was the first to receive the order to go to the Mirabel airport where the Canadian authorities were to put him on a plane for Istanbul Sunday evening. As you are aware, on the advice of Canadian friends who do not accept the brutal decision of the minister, he did not leave. With other Turks in the same situation, Ismail sought shelter in a small Catholic church in eastern Montreal with the consent of Archbishop Grégoire.

Ismail was physically and morally exhausted and I had to give him some reassurance. I told him: "Ismail, do not give up hope. Put your trust in Quebec and Canada. When Canadians have been told all the facts, they will rise as one to ask the government of their country to act with justice and compassion in the spirit of our Canadian traditions."

I spent several hours in this small church on Sherbrooke Street, and lived through some intense, deeply moving and on occasion most enthralling moments, such as when I saw Canadians of old stock come in to encourage the Turks with obvious conviction. Most important, I learned many things about their unfortunate story which I would like to share with you.

The 1,500 Turkish nationals who are to be sent back to Turkey in the near future are nearly all from the rural area of Denizli, 600 kilometers from Ankara. These were poor peasants and workers often unemployed in a country without any social security, and they were destitute. Those who worked earned at best $500 a year.

Suddenly, a rumour went around the whole region to the effect that Canada had an urgent need of 100,000 foreign workers, which was no surprise in a country which had sent many more than that to West Germany, for instance, and had thus contributed to the remarkable economic recovery of that country. Some of the Turkish newspapers, including such an important publication as Hurriyet, gave credence to that rumour which quickly captured the imagination of the poorest residents of Denizli. That was enough to arouse the greed of a number of travel agencies, including KLM and Sabena Airline representative Za-Na and Doktoroglu, which did everything to exacerbate the collective frenzy. In village cafes posters appeared praising the prosperity of Canada, an open country where Turkish people could go without visas, which was true... except that the agencies were careful not to indicate that to work here, they would require special visas. The airlines were offering cut-rate prices. In spite of everything, these prices were above the means of these poor people and represented several years of salary, especially because the men wanted to leave with their wives and children, without hope of ever returning. The families then had to sell everything they owned: A poor patch of land, a few farm appliances, the few pieces of jewellery which the women generally received when they got married. Some even borrowed money from loan sharks... on the premise that they could quickly repay their debts once settled in Canada.

This unbelievable story is absolutely authentic and something the Department of Immigration has known for a long time. It clearly demonstrates the good faith of these Turks who, when they arrived at Mirabel, were not lying when they told immigration officers that they were coming to Canada to work. When they realized that they had been fooled by these unscrupulous travel agencies, some 400 of the 2,000 Turks who had arrived in Montreal between September and December 1986 returned to Turkey because they had the means to do so. Absolutely penniless, the others had no other choice but to stay here, apply for refugee status and rely on the compassion for the disadvantaged of the earth which, until then, had always characterized Canada.

Because of a piece of immigration legislation which is outdated and inadequate, and also because of the administrative carelessness of the Department of Immigration, the minister waited 18 months before ruling that Ismail was not really a refugee and, therefore, would have to return to his country. If it had been made after two or three months, this decision would have been more bearable, even if Ismail and the other Turks had been returned to a distress greater than the one they thought they had left behind.

This is where unfairness starts. What happened to these 1,500 Turks over the past eighteen months? From the very first day, they were very well received by Quebecers. Because they are excellent workers, they wasted no time in finding jobs and their employers have nothing but praise for them. For the past eighteen months, we have taught them how to speak French, a language which their children already speak extremely well. Several got married, many to Quebec women, and some forty children are already the result of these marriages.

[English]

Every Canadian who has known them agrees that these Turks have made a real effort to become part of our society, that they are peaceful, honest and hard-working. They pay their taxes and contribute to our country's prosperity.

That is enough to explain the general consternation felt by many citizens when they learned that, in spite of all this, the Minister of Immigration was upholding his decision to send the Turks back to Turkey. It also explains the full support given to them by the Archbishop of Montreal, the Executive Committee of the City of Montreal, all agencies assisting refugees and immigrants, editorialists in La Presse and Le Devoir, and a multitude of citizens of all social classes. A committee to mediate on behalf of Turkish nationals threatened with expulsion has just been formed. This committee is a non-partisan committee of parliamentarians from all political parties, union leaders, businessmen, clergymen and such wide-ranging personalities as Professor Pierre Dansereau, J.-Z. Léon Patenaude, Pierre Bourgault and Jean-Louis Roux, to mention only the best-known among them.

These well-known public figures are determined to use every democratic means available to convince the Minister of Immigration to exercise his discretionary powers and invoke the "humanitarian grounds" provided for in the legislation so that the 1,500 Turks—and undoubtedly other foreign nationals in the same situation—are granted immigrant status. Such a move would be all the more reasonable given that for the past several years, Canada has not even met the modest immigration quota set by the minister himself.

At present, the wave of support for the Turks is growing daily in Quebec, and the rest of Canada is starting to rally behind them. This support could turn into a tidal wave when all the facts are disclosed. Some of these findings are particularly disturbing. For example, the Immigration Department was not taken by surprise and has known from the outset the story that I have just related to you, a story that shows that the Turks are victims of people who exploit human suffering, that they had no intention of breaking Canadian laws, and that they would not have come to Canada had they been informed in time.

Why did the department not react properly in September 1986 when the first 233 Turks arrived at Mirabel? Some 580 more arrived in October, an additional 603 in November and more than 700 others in December. It was only in November 1986 that the minister thought it appropriate to send an investigator to Turkey with the purpose of finding the reasons for this extraordinary exodus. Furthermore, the minister waited until January 8, 1987 to announce that Turkish visitors to Canada would require a visa, a decision that put an immediate end to the situation.

Yet, as early as October 1986, an Employment and Immigration Commission report was available to him. Here is an excerpt from that report:

A profile of the Turkish arrivals is as follows:

- all were in possession of valid passports and all airline tickets were paid for in cash;
- almost all were routed Istanbul-Brussels-Montreal;
- excluding children, the average age of the arrivals is between 25 and 35 years of age; there is a mix of family units and single persons;
- they have no destination or reception in Canada;
- the occupations listed are those of farmers, carpenters and construction workers;
- those who arrived on both Sabena Airlines and KLM Airlines bought all tickets through the Za-Na Travel Agency and Doktoroglu Travel Agency in Ismir;
- all were from the Dénizli area in south-west Turkey;
- all wished to come to Canada and remain permanently, a few initially indicated a desire to be considered as Convention refugees. (This will undoubtedly change once it becomes known that a refugee claim will entitle the claimant to seek and accept employment.)

[Translation]

The minister knew all that. However, he did not make any move before January 1987, when he required a visa. And he waited for 18 months to decide that Ismail and the others were not, according to his definition, real refugees, and that they had to leave the country.

He could have added that a number of those Turks have already been recognized by his department as real refugees in terms of the Geneva Convention, for example those of Kurdish origin—a persecuted minority—and others who were ill-treated by the Turkish police. Finally, how can the minister decide that the others are not refugees before they have been heard by the Immigration Appeal Board?

Perhaps the minister has the right to do this. But he also has the obligation to be fair and compassionate, and to adjust his definition to the spirit and the letter of the Geneva Convention, as expressed in paragraph E of the document drafted by the United Nations Conference of Plenipotentiaries, and I quote:

The Conference expresses the hope that, in addition to its contractual dimension, the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees will serve as an example and will encourage all States, inasmuch as possible, to extend to persons on their territory as refugees and not covered by the provisions of the Convention, the treatment provided for under the Convention.

In 1979, the United Nations High Commission for Refugees gave the following interpretation to this recommendation:

It gives States an opportunity to solve problems arising with persons who do not fully meet the criteria in the definition of the term “refugee”.

Finally, our own Immigration Act of 1976 recommends, and I quote:

...to fulfil Canada's international obligations with respect to refugees and to uphold its humanitarian tradition with respect to the displaced and the persecuted.

If ever there was a case where humanitarian considerations should be in order, it is the one involving 1,500 Turkish citizens. It is under such considerations that over these past years the department has already allowed into Canada tens of thousands of illegal immigrants certainly not more deserving than the Turks. The previous government went even further by granting general amnesty to citizens from India and Haiti back in 1980 and 1981. And, I suggest, Canada is certainly not worse off today, quite the contrary.

So that is the course the minister should follow, even though he remains convinced that the majority of the 1,500 Turks are not “genuine” refugees and do not risk anything by returning to Turkey, except, of course, falling back into extreme poverty. However, how can the minister be so sure that there are no other risks involved? How does he know that, despite their assurances, Turkish authorities will not react negatively towards citizens who certainly caused them some embarrassment by declaring themselves political refugees, out of despair? As Ms. Diane Bélanger, counsel, rightly said:

On many occasions, Turkey was accused by international human rights organizations for its apparent lack of respect for fundamental rights. One has only to look at the report released in January 1986 by Amnesty International which says that torture is being practised in Turkey despite the fact that, as early as 1984, that organization asked the United Nations to hold an inquiry on flagrant, continuous and systematic violations of human rights in Turkey.

In this context is it not reasonable to assume that the safety of people who claimed refugee status in Canada would be in serious jeopardy should they be sent back to Turkey?

For all these reasons, we must beg the Minister of Immigration to use the powers he has under the law to allow the 1,500 Turkish citizens to remain in Canada on humanitarian grounds.

I conclude by quoting these thoughts Jean-Claude Leclerc expressed in his editorial in this morning's Le Devoir.

We could understand Ottawa's firm stand if foreigners were abusing the system and forcing their way in, and Canadians were fed up with them. But when, on the contrary, the whole population sympathizes with the victims and makes room for them, the Government has no other choice but to favour a prompt settling of the issue. We have reason to rejoice, in Quebec, in the area of immigration: we have just seen the start of an era of welcome.

Honourable senators, I hope no one will say I called the attention of the Senate to a situation that is neither urgent nor serious.

No one will deny the urgency of relieving 1,500 unfortunate people of the anguish of having their lives broken. No one will deny the seriousness of an action that will tarnish Canada's reputation in the eyes of the world. And I am convinced everyone is hopeful the Minister of Immigration will find an honourable solution that will earn him the respect and the gratitude of all Canadians. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate Senator Hébert on bringing this very important matter before the Senate. I assure him that I am fully supportive of what he has said and at this point I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

[Senator Hébert.]

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT ON PRODUCTION AND USE OF NATURAL GAS IN CANADA EXTENDED

Hon. William J. Petten, for Senator Hastings, moved:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Wednesday, 1st April 1987, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, which was authorized to examine the production and use of natural gas in Canada with particular reference to natural gas deregulation, be empowered to present its report no later than Wednesday, 21st December 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, since he cannot be here, Senator Hastings asked me to move this motion standing in his name.

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources agreed to ask the Senate for an extension in order to prepare its report.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4:45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

APPENDIX(See p. 2880)THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88*REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (E)

TUESDAY, March 22, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1988, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of March 3, 1987, submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From the Treasury Board:

Mr. A.J. Darling, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch;
Mr. Brent DeBartolo, Chief, Estimates Division.

This report is divided into two sections. The first describes these estimates while the second focuses on the format proposed for future supplementary estimates.

Supplementary Estimates (E)

The appendix to this report contains material prepared by Treasury Board at the request of the Committee. This material is classified under the following four section headings:

1. Summary of Expenditure Framework and Estimates for 1987-88;
2. Statutory Items Included in Supplementary Estimates (E), 1987-88;
3. Summary of Voted Items (greater than $5 million) included in Supplementary Estimates (E), 1987-88; and
4. List of One-dollar Votes included in Supplementary Estimates (E), 1987-88 and Additional Explanations.

Supplementary Estimates (E), totalling $1.6 billion is the second and final regular supplementary estimates for the 1987-88 year. The other three previous supplementary estimates covered specific items: Supplementary Estimates (A) and (D) dealt with the Special Canadian Grains

Program, and Supplementary Estimates (B) dealt with economic and regional development funding, including funding for the Western Diversification Office and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. A summary of the five supplementary estimates and the main estimates is provided in "The Summary of the Expenditure Framework" found in section one of the appendix.

Of the total $1.6 billion, $883.9 million is required for statutory purposes, while the remaining $706.6 million is being requested as new spending authority. The twenty-nine items which make up the $882.9 million for statutory programs are briefly described in section two of the appendix. With respect to non-statutory items, each of those having a value of greater than $5 million is described in section three of the appendix. The Committee was informed that there are forty-six one-dollar votes included in these estimates; twenty-eight authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another; ten authorize the payment of grants; and eight are miscellaneous votes. These are described in section four.

These supplementary estimates bring the total estimates for the year to $116.8 billion, $116.7 of which is for budgetary purposes. Viewed another way, these estimates bring the total statutory estimates for the year to $74.1 billion or 63.4% of the total, and the voted estimates to $42.7 billion, or 36.6%.

New Format for Supplementary Estimates

These supplementary estimates are likely to be the last in the current format. A new format is expected in 1988-89 due in large part to the constant reminders by this Committee about the lack of clarity in supplementary estimates. The Committee has stated in past reports that the information contained in the estimates regarding the transfer of money from one vote to another was been inadequate. It has also indicated there are no summary tables for voted items or for statutory items. In the past, Treasury Board has responded to these criticisms by preparing additional detailed information expressly for the Committee; this material has been appended to the Committee's reports.

Beginning with the first supplementary estimates in 1988-89, a new format will be instituted and will include the following:

- a) Conversion of side by side English/French presentation to the tumble format used in the main estimates;
- b) Addition of the following tables/schedules summarizing the estimates;
  - i) Proposed Schedule to the Appropriation Bill. This will include:
    - ° the items in the associated supply bill,
    - ° the vote number, vote wording and amount of appropriation sought;
  - ii) A Table of Statutory Items in Supplementary Estimates. This will list:
    - ° all statutory entries included in the supplementary estimates by Ministry and Department;

- iii) A Table Summarizing Changes to Appropriations. This will include:
  - ° all votes for the fiscal year,
  - ° changes being proposed in the Estimates including transfers (into or out of the Vote) and new appropriations sought,
  - ° a year-to-date estimates total for each vote;
- c) Changes to the Program Display;
  - ° identifying funds being transferred into the vote in question;
  - ° identifying new appropriations being sought;
  - ° providing information on total estimates for the year including funds being transferred into the vote.

The Committee was pleased with the proposed changes and felt that they would facilitate a better understanding of how government expenditures change throughout a fiscal year.

Finally, the Committee wishes to express its thanks to the Treasury Board Secretariat for its cooperation and willingness to consider new ideas. Whether the new format will meet the test of time remains to be seen; the important thing is that government is willing to listen and respond when changes are required.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

APPENDIX IV

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN
SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (E), 1987-88

The 46 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed in Appendix I by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One Dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The votes are also identified in Appendix I, according to these categories. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X". In those instances where a vote falls into more than one category, the prime category is designated by an "X" and other categories by an "*".

- A. Twenty-eight votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)
- B. Ten votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)
- C. Eight miscellaneous votes. (Additional explanations are provided in Appendix II.)
- one to report actual excess operating and income charges over revenues for the Canada Post Corporation;
  - three to write-off certain debts due Her Majesty in Right of Canada - Employment and Immigration (2 votes) and Transport (one vote);
  - one vote to increase the drawdown Authority by $150 million for the Public Works Revolving Fund;
  - one vote to increase loan insurance for de Havilland - Regional Industrial Expansion;
  - one vote which amends provisions of Transport Vote 30, 1987-88 to include improvements to port facilities at the port of Churchill; and
  - one vote to amend the borrowing limits of Eldorado Nuclear Limited (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs).

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Consumer and Corporate Affairs - Canada Post Corporation

Vote 17e

To report the actual excess of operating and income charges over revenues for the Canada Post Corporation in the amount of $128,981,000 for the 12 month period ending March 31, 1987 in accordance with subsection 29(3) of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Explanation

In accordance with section 29(1) of the Canada Post Corporation Act (CPC Act), the Minister of Finance during 1986-87 placed at the disposal of the Corporation sufficient monies to enable the Corporation to meet all its operating and income charges during the year. Section 29(3) of the CPC Act requires that the amount placed at the disposal of the Corporation is to be included, in the form of a deficit appropriation item, in the next Estimates laid before Parliament thereafter. Since the amount placed at the disposal of the Corporation has already been reported as expenditures of the Government in the 1986-87 fiscal year, it cannot be voted as an expenditure in 1987-88. Accordingly, in order to conform with the intent of the Act, a $1 voted item has been included in these Supplementaries to inform Parliament of the actual amount of the Corporation's deficit for 1986-87. The actual 1987-88 deficit will be reported as a $1 item in 1988-89 Supplementary Estimates, again in accordance with Section 29(3) of the Act.

Employment and Immigration

Vote 6e

Corporate and Special Services - Pursuant to Section 18 of the Financial Administration Act, to write-off debts due Her Majesty in Right of Canada amounting in aggregate to $37,255.81 in regards to Government Annuities Accounts over-payments - To authorize the transfer of $37,255 from Employment and Immigration Vote 25, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1987-88 for purposes of this Vote.

Explanation

This involves the deletion of Annuities Accounts over-payments totalling $37,255.81 due the Crown. Funds are being transferred, via a $1 Vote transfer, from EIC Vote 25 (Immigration Program, Contributions) to this new Vote 6e.

Vote 21e

Immigration - Pursuant to Section 18 of the Financial Administration Act, to write-off 2,489 debts due Her Majesty in Right of Canada amounting in the aggregate to $280,024.32 in regards to transportation loans issued under Section 121 of the Immigration Act - To authorize the transfer of $280,024 from Employment and Immigration Vote 25, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1987-88 for the purposes of this Vote.

Explanation

This involves the deletion of 2,489 accounts due the Crown totalling $280,024.32 regarding immigration transportation loans. Funds are being transferred, via a $1 Vote transfer, from EIC Vote 25 (Immigration Program, Contributions) to this new Vote 21e.

Public Works

Vote 2e

Public Works Revolving Fund - In accordance with Section 33 of the Adjustment of Accounts Act, to increase from $300,000, 000 to $450,000,000 the amount by which the aggregate of expenditures made under Section 26 of that Act may exceed the revenues referred to in that section.

Explanation

Public Works provides real property services such as Architectural and Engineering, Property Management, Real Estate and Dredging to other government departments and agencies on a cost recovery basis. In 1988 PWC will be charging Market Rates for its services instead of only direct costs as is the current practice. This means that PWC will have to use its revolving fund to cover the $150M indirect costs it was previously appropriated. Also, the pass-through charges on the PWC revolving fund will increase by an additional $550M as a result of increased business and the inclusion of certain PWC items such as maintenance of Crown properties and payments of leases which had not been passed-through the fund previously. The total revolving fund pass-through has increased by $700M (from $1.2B to $1.9B).

Regional Industrial Expansion

Vote 1e

Regional Industrial Expansion - Operating expenditures - To provide that the aggregate amount of insurance outstanding at any time in respect of the de Havilland DHC-7 and DHC-8 aircraft, for the purposes described in Industry, Trade and Commerce Vote 1a, subparagraph (ii) Appropriation Act No.1, 1980-81 does not exceed $625,000, 000 and $250,000,000 U.S.

Explanation

Loan Insurance (Guarantee) for the de Havilland DHC-7 and DHC-8 Aircraft

To increase the level of Ministerial authority to provide loan insurance to an applicant for the purchase or lease of de Havilland DASH 7 or DASH 8 aircraft. The loans are arranged through approved commercial lenders.

Through 1980-81 Supplementary Estimates A, Parliament authorized the Minister of RIE (ITC at that time) to insure loans to a total maximum of $130M associated with the lease or sale of DASH 7 aircraft. This authority has been increased several times and extended to include DASH 8 aircraft. These estimates seek to increase the authority for loans in Canadian funds from $400M to $625M. The authority in U.S. funds remains unchanged at $250M U.S. Government insurance covers a maximum of 90% of the loan amount, with de Havilland responsible for the remaining 10% .

Transport

Vote 11e

Transport - Pursuant to Section 18 of the Financial Administration Act, to write off from the Accounts of Canada certain debts due her majesty in Right of Canada in respect of Coast Ferries Ltd. - To authorize the transfer of $74,999 from Transport Vote 5, Appropriation Act No.3, 1987-88 for the purposes of this Vote.

Explanation

Transport Canada was authorized to collect $25,000 out of a $100,000 loan to Coast Ferries Ltd., out of an insurance settlement resulting from a fire destroyed asset. Authority is now sought under Section 18 of the F.A.A. to write-off the balance of $75,000 which is not considered recoverable.

Transport - Canada Ports Corporation*Vote 30e

Payment to the Canada Ports Corporation - To extend the purposes of Transport Vote 30, Appropriation Act No.3, 1987-88 to include improvements to port facilities at the port of Churchill, Manitoba.

Explanation

Certain works undertaken at Churchill were to have been completed during FY 1986-87, but were not, with the result that costs were incurred in 1987-88. Additional, the pace of work at Sept Iles will result in only a portion of the proposed work program these being completed, resulting in a potential lapse of funds.

Privatization and Regulatory Affairs - Eldorado Nuclear Limited*Vote L35e

Eldorado Nuclear Limited - To amend Energy, Mines and Resources Vote L107e, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1981-82:

- (a) to authorize Eldorado Nuclear Limited to increase its total borrowing from $600,000,000 to an amount outstanding from time to time not exceeding $700,000,000 until December 31, 1992 in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance; and
- (b) to reduce Eldorado Nuclear Limited's borrowing authority under paragraph (a) above to a maximum amount outstanding from time to time of $600,000,000 from January 1, 1993 to December 31, 1993, of $500,000,000 from January 1, 1994 to December 31, 1994 and $400,000,000 thereafter.

Explanation

Eldorado's existing $600M borrowing authority will expire at the end of 1988, after which the company would not be able to make any new loans. Although the current plan is to merge Eldorado's assets with those of the Saskatchewan Mining Development Company (SMDC). Eldorado will continue to exist as a corporation and it will continue to need authority to borrow new money to pay-off the old loans pending the sale of shares in the new company. In addition, it remains possible that a merger will not be consummated.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—STILL PHOTOGRAPHY POOL AUTHORIZED TO RECORD MARCH 30 PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

That a still photography pool be permitted to record proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to on Wednesday, March 30, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will first state the reason for this motion.

Senator Murray: He wouldn't come unless . . .

Senator Frith: I will tell honourable senators why I pause. What I was first going to do was to apologize, as I apologized to Senator Doody, about one aspect of this, but then I thought, "Why apologize until I say what it is I am going to apologize for?" So, moving right back now to where I wanted to be, honourable senators will recall that the access given to camera coverage of the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole was given to two cameras to be located in the chamber with videotape the proceedings of the committee. That videotape was then going to be available to a news pool.

For Mr. Trudeau's appearance we have had some requests—and Senator Molgat will correct me if I am stating any facts incorrectly—not to change anything in the chamber but simply to permit the feed to go through OASIS on the television channel allocated to the Senate. One problem with that, of course, is that OASIS, itself, belongs to the House of Commons. However, there is a channel allocated to the Senate. From there, then, other people who might want to take the feed can do so, but must make their arrangements through OASIS. We want simply to get the feed to OASIS.

When these preparations were being developed, we were asked by some still photographers if they could be given similar access, because we appeared to be giving preferential treatment to the video over the still photographers. That is why I am asking that they be given access.

Now the apology. This matter was raised in our caucus this week. I had meant to raise the matter in advance with Senator Doody so that he could raise it in the government caucus also. I did not do that, and that is what I apologize for. So "those are the jokes, folks," as they say in other areas of show business.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Opposition a question on this subject.

I have listened carefully to what Senator Frith had to say, but from his remarks I did not discover the purpose of this whole exercise. My understanding of the Committee of the Whole is that we, as senators, sit and listen to arguments on the matter being examined. I am trying to understand what value is added to our deliberations to have this particular activity recorded on tape, or whatever is being suggested.

Senator Frith: I would rather not redebate that. We have authorized the video cameras. There were reservations expressed by certain senators at the time of that debate. I cannot remember specifically whether or not Senator Kelly was one of those senators expressing reservations. We discussed and did finally pass a resolution permitting the access that I described in my earlier remarks today.

Today I am simply asking for an opportunity for still photographers to attend, as well as video cameras, all based on the assumption that such arrangements will not interfere with our proceedings, and will be subject to the same conditions that apply to the video cameras in our original resolution authorizing their presence here.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I am still trying to understand what this additional dimension brings to this whole activity. Where did the suggestion that still cameras be included originate? I am trying to understand why we would do that.

Senator Frith: Were you here when I began speaking on this subject, or did you just arrive, Senator Kelly?

Senator Kelly: I believe I was here.

Senator Frith: I just wondered how far back we should rewind the tape.

Senator MacDonald: To the prayers.

Senator Frith: Senator MacDonald suggests that we do not need to go back any further than the prayers. That is today's prayers, I take it.

Is the question: What does the addition of still photography add to the permission already accorded by authorizing the presence of video cameras?

Senator Kelly: Yes.

Senator Frith: What it adds is still photography.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, I had the honour of presiding at the joint committee last summer in the absence of Senator Tremblay. A similar request was made to the joint committee. Perhaps, for the benefit of senators, I might point out the decision that was made at that time.

The decision on a similar question was that still photographers would be allowed in for a very short period of time prior to the beginning of the proceedings. They would then move away and let the proceedings follow their course.

Senator Frith: I take it the television cameras were allowed to stay throughout the whole proceeding but the still cameras were excluded.

Senator Cogger: The entire proceedings were televised, and the still photographers were removed as the proceedings began.

Senator Frith: I just want to understand. The television cameras were allowed to stay, but the still photographers were asked to leave.

Senator Cogger: That is right.

Senator Frith: I do not think that is fair, and that is why I am suggesting this motion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that leads to the question that I would like to ask: How still is the still photographer? If he is going to stay still in a part of this chamber and take pictures, that is fine with me. However, if he is going to dart around the room like a little magpie and do his thing at various angles, that could be quite distracting and make the place look perhaps more circus-like than we want it to look.

I appreciate the desire of my honourable friends opposite to have this nostalgic trip back to Camelot. Nevertheless, in the interest of the decorum of the chamber, surely we should try to ensure that the still photographer is reasonably still.

Senator Frith: I think we are making real progress. Apparently we have the sympathetic understanding of Senator Doody. We have that on so many issues, and I am glad to know that this is one of them.

The other question is, again, as usual, a good question. I assume that they will be very still, indeed, but I do not know. I will ask Senator Molgat if he knows anything more about how still, as in "How still the night!" "Be still my heart!"—the still photographers will still be.

● (1410)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, they are, indeed, very still. They do not move; they do not come on the floor of the Senate. It is really what is going on in the House of Commons now, but, as you know, the House of Commons has a different physical structure from ours. Behind the chamber there are curtains, with a seating place behind that. Still photographers are allowed in the House of Commons behind that curtain—I think there are either one or two; I am not sure of the exact number—and they are there during the course of the proceedings to take pictures. However, there are no flashes, there is no noise, and there are no extra lights. It is simply a question of having them there.

Here the intention would presumably be to have them sit in the Press Gallery—at the corners, or possibly in the other gallery. They would not be moving about.

Senator Doody: I notice that Senator Molgat has been using the plural all the time, and I think Senator Frith referred to "a pool." I thought a pool would be representative of a group of photographers, but that is not so; there is a whole pool of photographers coming in. Is that correct?

Senator Frith: Over to you, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: No, it would not be an army.

Senator Doody: Not an army?

Senator Petten: A company!

Senator Molgat: For example, if an honourable senator from over here is speaking, it is difficult for a photographer sitting up in the gallery to get the picture, as is the case if one is sitting over on the other side. So it would be two or three, but no more than that.

As I understand it, the rules would be the same as they are for the television cameras, namely, that they only take pictures of the individual who is asking the question or answering the question. So it would not be panning.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: I wonder if the possibility had been considered of consulting Senator Davey to see if the entire proceedings could not be moved to the National Press Centre, which perhaps is better equipped.

Senator Frith: Strangely, we did not think of that—

Senator Davey: That is not a bad idea!

Senator Frith: —but Senator Davey says that that is not a bad idea. Thanks for asking, senator.

Senator Flynn: Is this applicable only to next Wednesday's sitting?

Senator Doody: What about Thursday?

Senator Frith: That is all I am asking for, but if we want it for more I would be glad to change the motion.

Senator Petten: Make it Thursday!

Senator Flynn: Why do you ask for that particular day?

Senator Frith: Because that is what they asked for.

Senator Flynn: Who did?

Senator Frith: The still photographers.

Senator Molgat: I might point out that the request comes from the Press Gallery; the request and the phone call to me originated from the president of the Press Gallery.

Senator Doody: Will they need any help in finding the place?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, An Act to provide for emergency preparedness and to make a related amendment to the National Defence Act.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon Senator Kelly explained the import of the emergency preparedness bill, which is now before us. In my view, his explanation was altogether adequate and requires only a few supplementary comments from me.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I was also interested in Senator Kelly's historical summary of the antecedents of this bill and of Emergency Preparedness Canada and the various agencies that from 1948 to the present time have assumed responsibility for seeing that Canada is prepared for various types of emergencies.

Senator Kelly pointed out that this bill is primarily and largely designed to give statutory authority for a state of affairs which is already in existence, thus enhancing the status and the authority of Emergency Preparedness Canada and of its executive director. He did try to point out that it was not only the preservation of the status quo but that there were some special things that this bill did. However, the primary thrust of this bill was that by giving statutory authority for Emergency Preparedness Canada its prestige and authority would be enhanced and it would have its own budget in the Estimates, and so on.

Senator Kelly then referred to the fact that Bill C-76 required the executive director and Emergency Preparedness Canada to report to a minister. However, that minister was not likely to be the Prime Minister. He then went on to express some regrets or reservations of his own that the direction of Emergency Preparedness Canada would not continue to be under the direct control of the Prime Minister or be directed from the Privy Council Office. I am not sure that I agree with Senator Kelly on this point. If I may interject a personal note, I remember when, for a time, I was the head of a much smaller government in the province of Nova Scotia. I was constantly besieged by people who wanted to have direct authority to report to the premier and not to any other minister. I tried to point out to these people that, while they might think that this would give them a much better line into cabinet and into the executive making decisions, it did not always turn out to be that way. I pointed out that the premier of a province was often very busy, that if he had a good minister, in whom he had confidence, that minister might very well see that the specialized interests of the individual who wanted to report directly to the premier were dealt with effectively and quickly. So it does not seem to me to be much of a limitation that this bill does not require the EPC to report directly to the Prime Minister, or even to the Privy Council Office. Obviously, if there were a serious emergency in the country, no Prime Minister would want to remain aloof from it. He would want to be involved, and this proposed legislation puts no hurdles in the way of a Prime Minister wishing to become directly involved in what might result from an emergency situation.

● (1420)

It seems to me a good thing that in the past few years the minister responsible for Emergency Preparedness Canada has been the Minister of National Defence. I do not think that we could contemplate a really serious emergency in Canada without the Department of National Defence becoming involved. It seems to me that the direction of the Department of National Defence and the direction of the emergency preparedness office might very well be coordinated by the Minister of National Defence. I point out to the Senate that clause 10 of this bill removes from the National Defence Act the statement that the Minister of National Defence performs the duties of "preparation for civil defence against enemy action." This responsibility has been taken away from the Minister of National Defence. Presumably, the preparation for civil defence against enemy action, along with some other emergencies referred to in Bill C-76, will come under the executive director of Emergency Preparedness Canada and the minister to whom that executive director reports. I do not think that this is necessarily a serious matter, but I repeat what I said before, that in a serious emergency it seems inevitable to me that the Minister of National Defence, and perhaps even the Canadian Armed Forces, would have to be involved. Therefore, I can see a reason why that minister should control both our armed forces and the emergency preparedness mechanism.

There is a companion piece of legislation to this bill, the Emergencies Act, which, I hope, will be enacted soon. This legislation takes the form of Bill C-77, which has not come to us as yet. There is a reference in Bill C-76 to the Emergencies Act. I refer to paragraph 5(1)(g), which reads:

The functions of Emergency Preparedness Canada with respect to the development of civil emergency plans are

(g) to establish arrangements with each province whereby any consultation with the lieutenant governor in council of the province required by the Emergencies Act with respect to a declaration of an emergency under that Act can be effectively carried out; and the clause goes on from there.

Therefore, the passage of this bill definitely envisages the coming into force of the Emergencies Act, and I hope that that legislation, which I suspect may have some features with some more degree of controversy in them than Bill C-76, will come before us at an early date.

Honourable senators, with these minor reservations or observations, I concur with the second reading of this bill and intend to support it.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: Very briefly, I find little to disagree with in what Senator Hicks has said. I think his points were well taken.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Cogger).

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to speak to this order today. It is a subject of some importance, which has been the object of much debate in this chamber, and I wish to reflect upon it further during the Easter holidays. Then I will be ready to address the house.

Senator Frith: And the poor, the elderly gouged in the meantime!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I can appreciate that Senator Cogger may want to reflect on Bill S-15, but he said he required until after the Easter recess. There are some very important reasons why this bill should be given second reading and referred to committee, one of them being that we can invite some of the principal spokesmen for the pharmaceutical companies to come back to the Senate committee so that we can ask them why they have violated the firm undertakings they gave when they were here before.

Senator Barootes: Allegedly firm.

Senator Olson: Let us get at the truth. I hope Senator Cogger will not attempt to sit on this and simply postpone it while he is reflecting for that long period of time.

There are people who are now paying as much as 30 per cent, 40 per cent and as high as 200 per cent more for prescription drugs than they were paying prior to January 1. This time delay is unconscionable and therefore I would ask him to get on with it.

Senator Cogger: Let me apologize, senators. I indicated to Senator Haidasz, who called me recently, that I was quite prepared to yield to him and allow him to speak on this matter, reserving my right, of course, to still address the question. I do not think there is anything unconscionable about that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it may be that Senator Cogger has not had the privilege or the obligation to go into some of the pharmacies and pay some of these ridiculous price increases. I merely want to advise him that I will attempt to take some action shortly to see if we can get this past second reading. He, therefore, should not stand in the way by continually attempting to adjourn the debate.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is only fair to point out that there is no intention of delaying the debate. Any honourable senator who wishes to participate is quite welcome to do so. Senator Cogger has made it perfectly clear that he will yield to anyone at any time. As he has said, it is a very important matter and one in which he is very interested. I understand that he is doing quite a bit of research, and when he has the necessary material he will address the question. In the meantime, if Senator Olson wishes to participate, he can speak now or tomorrow, or, indeed, we can come back on Friday or Monday if he wishes.

● (1430)

Senator Olson: Obviously the Deputy Leader of the Government missed the point. I simply want to get the bill to committee so that we can ask the people who have caused the problem to explain why and under what terms and conditions they did it.

However, that is not the point that prompted me to raise the matter. I want to ask the spokesmen for the pharmaceutical companies to appear before the committee and account for what they have done, which is a complete violation and contradiction of what they promised when they previously appeared before the committee.

Senator Doody: One understands Senator Olson's reluctance to speak. He has already done so.

An Hon. Senator: What committee do you have in mind?

Senator Olson: The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. That is where it was dealt with.

Order stands.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-83, An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I fully appreciate the fact that Senator Stewart is unavoidably absent today; but I am wondering whether there is any intention of having this bill brought forward and debated in the Senate. Perhaps we could have second reading and get it moved into a committee. A certain number of people have shown a great deal of interest in it. I would not want to accuse honourable senators opposite of delaying the bill; but I certainly would like to see some action on it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sure we can talk.

Order stands.

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

[Senator Doody.]

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps it would be a good idea to have this order stand temporarily. Honourable senators may wish to speak on other orders, and we can then return to Order No. 7.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We can stand it for longer than that, if the honourable senator wishes.

Senator Frith: I used the word "temporarily" advisedly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Rule 106 of the Rules of the Senate) presented in the Senate on Tuesday, March 22, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Senate is in such a good mood today that I am sure that such a non-controversial proposition as the one which this report proposes will be accepted readily.

Rule 106 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada says:

Seats shall be reserved without the Bar of the Senate Chamber for members of the House of Commons who may desire to hear the debates.

The procedure has been that at the south end of the chamber, where the brass bar is located, the chairs in the space beyond the bar can be used by members of the House of Commons who wish to listen to our debates. The chairs are not frequently used, but they have been used on occasion.

It was suggested by Senator Corbin that the Senate should give consideration to extending that same privilege to former members of the Senate. As honourable senators are aware, former members of the Senate are frequently seen sitting in the galleries.

This practice of reserving space for former colleagues is fairly common in the provincial legislatures. There are two chesterfields set aside in the Legislative Assembly of the province of Manitoba for former members. They are welcome to use those chesterfields at any time. Distinguished visitors sometimes use them, but generally they are reserved for former members of the legislature.

The suggestion is that we amend the rules so that former members of the Senate can sit in the seats now reserved for the members of the House of Commons.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: How many seats will be provided? Only the seats that are now available, or is it the intention to have a couple of rows of seats so that you can call in a lot of former senators for next Wednesday, for instance?

Senator Doody: How is the recruiting going?

Senator Frith: Another good idea comes from the other side!

Senator Flynn: If you are talking about the seats that are there now, and not adding more seats, I see no difficulty with the proposed amendment to the rules, although I could speculate on what could happen on some occasions.

Senator Frith: Next Thursday, for example?

Senator Flynn: Next Thursday, but more so next Wednesday.

Senator Molgat: I cannot specifically answer that question, because I do not know if there are more chairs available to be brought into the chamber, although I presume there are.

Perhaps this is not a good time to bring forward this amendment; however, I can assure honourable senators that this is unrelated to the events of next Wednesday. I can assure Senator Flynn of that, but I can see I will have difficulty convincing him.

Senator Frith: Or next Thursday! We can let the matter stand. It is not related to the events of next Wednesday.

Senator Molgat: I am sure the members of the Rules Committee who attended the meeting at which this item was discussed did not give any consideration to that; the consideration was that this is a courtesy we should offer to former senators. However, I am sure extra chairs can be brought in if they are needed.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that the amendment state that the seats that are presently available be provided for that purpose. I do not think we should have two rows of chairs back there.

In any event, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Rule 67(1)(d) of the Rules of the Senate), presented in the Senate on March 22, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the eighth report has to do with translation. Some senators will remember that some time ago the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders proposed to amend the rules of the Senate to change the name of this committee.

At the very last minute the Table notified me that, in their opinion, the translation was not acceptable, that the French terms did not convey the very same meaning as the English version and the purpose for the change.

In spite of that, I suggested at the time that the Senate should adopt the report so that the House of Commons, which had already made the change, could continue to sit for the time being and that we should have discussions with the House of Commons.

We have had these discussions. I am delighted to inform you that our legal advisers here were right, so that we propose another change to the name. The French text, therefore, should read:

Le comité mixte d'examen de la réglementation, auquel doivent être nommés huit sénateurs . . .

Following this change and during the ensuing discussion it was decided that another change might be made to the English text to make it more precise. In view of this, we recommend that the English text be changed so as to read:

The Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

I believe the House of Commons fully concur and so do our translating people. This committee, which has been at work for quite a long time, now has a name which should satisfy everybody.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 7:

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before we call our first witness in, I believe that Senator Barootes wishes to raise a point of order. Senator Barootes?

Senator Barootes: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My point of order has to do with the appropriateness and propriety of the appearance before us of the next witness. It is my understanding that members of the other place do not, as a rule, appear before the Senate in this chamber to give evidence. Moreover, it is my understanding that members of the federal cabinet from time to time appear in this chamber and at Senate committees in their capacity as ministers of government departments. My point of order is as to whether it is right, appropriate and proper for the next witness to appear in this chamber. In view of the fact that this will imminently be a fait accompli, and we do not wish to cause any embarrassment to the honourable gentleman, may I ask whether he is appearing here—inappropriately, as I believe—under his own invitation or whether he has been invited by our steering committee to appear?

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may, I will begin with the last question first. The steering committee of the Committee of the Whole did not issue an invitation to Mr. Johnston. It was his request to come here. If my memory serves me correctly, the steering committee, by a decision of the steering committee, reported to the Committee of the Whole and approved by the Committee of the Whole, agreed to send invitations to a small number of persons. I believe specific invitations were issued to our witnesses of next week, Mr. Trudeau, Professor Russell, Professor Cairns and, subsequently, Premier Bourassa and one of his cabinet ministers, Mr. Rémillard. There was no invitation, then, issued to Mr. Johnston. He is appearing before us at his request.

All requests to appear before the Committee of the Whole were discussed by the steering committee, which approved of any persons who asked to appear here. The steering committee reported to the Committee of the Whole its recommendations as to who was to be heard, and the Committee of the Whole voted in favour of hearing those persons. Therefore, Mr. Johnston is appearing today by a decision of the Committee of the Whole on recommendation of the steering committee. That is the procedure which occurred.

In general terms, Senator Barootes, I know that the appearance of members of the House of Commons before us has been a matter of concern to senators in the past. It is not, however, a frequent occurrence. Quite often members of the House of Commons have appeared before Senate committees. I recall, although I do not recall the name of the member, that some months ago on a bill having to do with a sweetening product—Senator Barootes may recall that bill—a member of the House of Commons concerned with the legislation appeared before a committee of the Senate.

In any event, in this particular case I can assure senators that the decision was made by the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Barootes: I thank the chairman for his explanation. The reason I raise this as a precedent is that it is fairly obvious that the witness has an excellent platform and forum in which to express his views in the other place. That is why I brought the matter to the attention of honourable senators.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Barootes.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, you mentioned Premier Bourassa and his minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs. Have they indicated a desire to appear?

The Chairman: I have had a response from both of them. The first response came from Premier Bourassa, and sometime later a response came from Mr. Rémillard. Both of them have declined to appear.

It was my intention to table in the committee all the requests that went forward and the responses that were received.

If there are no further business matters, then I ask our first witness to join us.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, the Honourable Donald J. Johnston, P.C., M.P., was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome our first witness this afternoon, the Honourable Donald J. Johnston, who, I believe, needs no introduction to this chamber. He is a well-known colleague from the other place.

Mr. Johnston has sent a copy of his brief directly to all members of the Senate. It was decided, therefore, that it was not necessary to recirculate it.

Mr. Johnston, on behalf of my colleagues I would like to welcome you this afternoon. Our preference is to allow for a 15- or 20-minute presentation, to be followed by questions from senators. If that is agreeable to you, we will proceed in that way. We have one hour at our disposal, and we would like to adhere to our time limit, because we have witnesses to appear following you.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston, P.C., M.P.: Honourable senators, it is an honour and a privilege to be here. I heard someone say that I already had an excellent platform in the House of Commons, but, quite frankly, I cannot think of a better platform than this one.

Mr. Chairman, I have sent a rather extensive submission to senators. I do not intend to review it. In fact, in my initial remarks I do not even intend to deal with many of the arguments set forth in it. However, I would welcome questions afterwards.

Essentially, the brief that I submitted contains arguments to support the view that the Meech Lake Accord creates further decentralization and power in favour of all provinces through an entrenched constitutional mechanism that points more to a confederation than to a federation. It points to a total constitutional impasse through a requirement of provincial and federal unanimity for significant amendments. It also represents a retreat from the vision of a bilingual, multicultural Canada to a concept of two nations, one English-speaking and one French-speaking, each with geographically defined limits, and a status for Quebec as a distinct society which could provide constitutional legitimacy to future separatist demands for an independent nation.

Mr. Chairman, I have also taken the liberty of submitting to honourable senators a submission which I made recently to the Ontario Select Committee. This submission deals primarily with certain arguments put forward by constitutional authorities such as Professor Lederman and Professor Hogg, who both support the Meech Lake Accord. I point out in that submission how their sanguine view of the Meech Lake Accord contrasts dramatically with the opinions of Premier Bourassa and Minister Rémillard. I regretted to hear in your opening comments, Mr. Chairman, that they will not be appearing before you.

You have heard many arguments on the points I have just touched upon. I read an excellent brief which was submitted to you as of last week from Professor Brian Schwartz of the University of Manitoba. His brief covers many of the technical, legal aspects that I dealt with in my own material, although I deal with them in a somewhat different way.

[Translation]

But today, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I would like to review a few recent events that are significant in this debate on Meech Lake. First, the position taken by New Brunswick's Premier, Mr. Frank McKenna, and the shameful blackmail used by Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa to convince him to change his positions.

The second matter I would like to raise at the beginning of my comments deals with the annual report of the Official Languages Commissioner, which was tabled yesterday.

Third, I would like to focus your attention on the attitude of Mr. Bourassa himself on the distinct society and this language duality in the Commissioner's report.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to develop the idea that the Accord's obvious shortcomings and flaws will be corrected during a second or third round of constitutional discussions.

First, the questions raised by Mr. McKenna are the following: Last week, Mr. McKenna apparently met with Mr. Bourassa. He raised the same objections he expressed before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons last year, even before he was elected New Brunswick's Premier.

He should therefore realize, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, that the objections he raised, the six questions he put last year were part of his election platform in New Brunswick. He is simply following up on the position he took last year and defended during the general election in New Brunswick. In turn, he is becoming the target of irrational attacks from Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa.

Even a newsman like Mr. Michel Roy, whom I hold in high esteem in every respect, a veteran newspaper man, referred to that. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Roy's editorial that appear in La Presse last Saturday, from which I quote: "The young and proud leader . . . is entertaining his neighbour from Quebec with arrogant talk on Meech Lake and Canada's future."

He goes on to look for the reason behind those objections. He refers to the intervention of liberals of the Trudeau-ite school. That school of thought is scrutinizing Meech Lake among others. Mr. Chairman, that is not the Trudeau-ites' school, but the school of Macdonald, Laurier, Pearson, John Diefenbaker and of course Trudeau and every single Prime Minister since Confederation. It is not only the Trudeau-ite school. I understand Mr. Trudeau will be here next week.

But he did not realize that Mr. McKenna is the only elected leader in Canada now governing Canadians in his province under a specific mandate on Meech Lake. If there is arrogance there, Mr. Chairman, it is mainly on the part of Quebec, which does not accept the democratic reality of the overwhelming mandate Mr. McKenna received from the people in his province.

[English]

If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, I will be quite happy to defend it during questions and answers. Neither Mr. Mulroney nor Mr. Bourassa nor any other premier of this country has a mandate on Meech Lake like the mandate that Premier Frank McKenna holds.

One can say that the Commissioner of Official Languages, with equal arrogance, questions Meech Lake. In my view, he is a bit too gentle, but he does see the dangers inherent in Meech Lake, pointing as it does to a French Quebec in an English Canada, the point which I made in my own brief and which I raised at the outset.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of senators to a number of comments that the commissioner has made. First, I would like to say that I agree with his analysis, but not necessarily with his conclusions. At page 7 of his report he makes this statement:

But a majority of Canadian electors and a majority of their elected representatives remain firmly opposed to a straight territorial solution to Canada's special linguistic dilemma, as being, in the end, a recipe for national suicide.

With all its imperfections, some form of official bilingualism is the only answer that does not point toward a progressive dismemberment of Canada.

• (1500)

Well, Mr. Chairman, I happen to agree with that analysis that Canada will not survive with a unilingual French Quebec otherwise surrounded by a sea of anglophone Canada. He goes on to say that the language sections of the Meech Lake Accord are an honest attempt to address that issue. Mr. Chairman, I say to you and to honourable senators that it is not an honest attempt to address that issue at all. In fact, it does not address the issue, even as the commissioner suggests it does.

For example, elsewhere on page 6 he refers to the constitutional commitment to preserve the minority communities. I point out to honourable senators that the Meech Lake Accord does not contain any commitment to maintain minority communities. It commits the legislatures to preserve the existence of French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec and the existence of English-speaking Canadians in Quebec. Those are not communities, Mr. Chairman. There is a big difference between the preservation of a community, with its institutions, infrastructure and everything that makes a community of interest, and simply saying that we are to preserve the existence of English- or French-speaking Canadians, as the case may be.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to honourable senators that the commissioner has identified the problem. I think he has been overly generous in his view of the Meech Lake Accord, but it is perfectly clear that he sees it moving us in the direction of a French Quebec in an English Canada. Mr. Chairman, this has been a concern of everyone concerned with the bilingual issue from the outset, going back to the B & B Commission—and Senator Frith was actually a member of that commission.

Recently I picked up a copy of the dissenting opinion of the late Frank Scott, written with respect to Recommendation 42, which essentially supported the findings of the commission. He was concerned about one aspect which, he said, "will strengthen the hands of those, and their numbers are increasing, who think there can be a unilingual Quebec in a bilingual Canada."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to honourable senators that the growing number that Professor Scott was referring to at that time seems now to include most of the supporters of the Meech Lake Accord.

Professor Lederman, whose position I addressed in my exposé to the Ontario Select Committee, refers in his writing to the "distinct society" of French-speaking Canadians. There is no room for any other minority groups within that structure. [Translation]

What does Mr. Bourassa think of that, Mr. Chairman? He has not accepted your invitation to come here, nor has Mr. Rémillard, apparently. But when he refused the first time to come here, in front of the Senate—though maybe not officially—Mr. Bourassa said, as was published on February 13 in Le Devoir:

Our position is well known. The Honourable Senators may read the deliberations of the National Assembly where I have explained why I approve the agreement.

[English]

So, Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite fair of us sitting here to see what Mr. Bourassa has said in the National Assembly.

[Translation]

Thus, very briefly since I understand that I have only a few minutes and because I am anxious to hear the questions, I would like to bring to the attention of Honourable senators several comments that Mr. Bourassa has offered to his colleagues of the National Assembly.

On that same topic of a French-speaking Quebec, an exclusively French-speaking Quebec, on June 4, right after the Langevin Agreement, he said and I quote:

... we must not only protect but promote the French language in Quebec. That is what we got yesterday in the Constitutionnal Agreement.

And later, speaking of Mr. Pierre-Marc Johnson, he added:

... he must have been rejoicing over this great political victory we had achieved, one of the greatest political victories which the people of Quebec have experienced since the beginning of their history and which is acknowledged as such ...

Further on he went on to say:

The Constitution will give Quebec the means to maintain and promote the distinct character of the province, and it will provide a constitutional foundation for the French fact in Quebec.

Further still, Mr. Chairman, referring to the impact of the distinct society clause, he said:

... first we must conclude that the distinct society clause is a major victory which is more than sheer symbolism, because henceforth the Constitution of the country will have to be interpreted in light of this acknowledgement. The French language is a basic aspect of this specificity, but there are others such as culture as well as political, economic and judicial institutions. As we have said on a number of occasions we did not want to be more precise so as to avoid reducing the role of the National Assembly in promoting this specificity ...

And further still:

With clause 2 we have secured safe and sound constitutional means to consolidate our powers in the linguistic realm.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, but what is the point? I can assure you that the tone and meaning of each comment Mr. Bourassa made during the National Assembly debate clearly indicate he is trying to have a unilingual francophone Quebec in Canada, and this flies in the face of the recommendations of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Mr. Chairman, finally I want to deal with the last question. Several times Mr. Bourassa said: If there are problems we will solve them at the next round. There will be a second round, a third round, and so on.

Michel Roy, whom I consider to be a very astute man, a very good journalist, said:

... that in a second or third round of constitutional negotiations the objectives sought by Fredericton will become accessible.

Mr. Chairman, we know very well that one of Mr. McKenna's objectives is to have the Charter protected against the idea of the distinct society.

In light of the evidence given by Mr. Spector, who is adviser to the Prime Minister, we know very well that it was what we call a deal breaker and that Quebec would not go for it.

Why would Mr. Bourassa agree to change this policy at a new round of negotiations? The same goes for the question of Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Mr. Bourassa stated before a committee of the National Assembly, and perhaps even before the National Assembly, that Quebec was seeking a veto to prevent the creation of new provinces.

So all I can say, Mr. Chairman and senators, is that the train will have left the station for good. There can be no question of making changes at the second or third round.

[English]

So I say, Mr. Chairman, in concluding these remarks—which have a lot to do with the substance but little to do with the text that I have submitted to you, but, because they are recent events, I wanted to address them—I say to you that if you believe as the Commissioner of Official Languages does, as all of our Prime Ministers have done, that the territorial division of the country into a French-speaking Quebec and an English-speaking rest of Canada will create the dismemberment of Canada and take us squarely in the direction of les deux nations, then you must reject Meech Lake.

Similarly, Mr. Chairman, if we—as I believe we all do at the federal level—believe that Canada is greater than the sum of its parts, then we must reject Meech Lake. Similarly, if we believe that there is a national vision greater than provincial and local visions, then I also suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we must reject Meech Lake.

● (1510)

Mr. Chairman, I think I have said enough to get the session going, and I look forward very much to questions from honourable senators.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Johnston. Indeed, I do have some questioners on my list. The first questioner will be Senator Fairbairn, who will be followed by Senator Gigantès.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and welcome, Mr. Johnston. In your remarks you dwelt at some length on the threat to the credibility of the Charter in terms of "distinct society."

In the same vein, I am wondering whether you could give us your views on section 16 of the Meech Lake Accord in that it specifically affirms Charter protection for aboriginal and multicultural rights, and in so doing may well open the rest of the rights under the Charter to challenge, namely, women's rights, mobility rights, and so on. I wonder if you could discuss that particular section.

Mr. Johnston: Indeed, Senator Fairbairn—through you, Mr. Chairman—section 16, of course, has been raised as a problem by all constitutional experts. Professor Lederman, who supports the Accord, has disregarded section 16. Specifically, he says that it is superfluous. However, there is another well-known rule of interpretation that parliaments do not speak in a superfluous way. Therefore, the other school of thought is that the maxim Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius would apply; namely, if you include one, you are, perforce, excluding others, and it has raised a major ambiguity.

If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, that is one of the reasons why I have pointed out to the premiers, the Prime Minister, to the Ontario legislature and in my own brief to you here today that there are questions such as that which could very easily be clarified by a judicial reference before the Meech Lake Accord becomes cast in stone. Therefore, I think that section 7 has created legitimate concerns in terms of constitutional interpretation.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you. I have one additional question. I was interested in your reference to comments by Premier Bourassa, in either the National Assembly or in a committee of that body, specifically concerning the creation of new provinces in the North. This is a matter that our committee and a task force of that committee have studied in some detail. I wonder if you could give us a reference for those comments.

Mr. Johnston: I could indeed, senator. I was just looking at it this morning. I thought I saw it in proceedings of the National Assembly, but it is specifically in hearings before the committee of that assembly. I have a copy of it here with me and could probably find it for you.

This move on the part of the premiers and of the Prime Minister was not accidental, as many people have tried to make the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories believe. It was very specific. I am referring now to the blues from the committee, and the reference is 2465—C1—page 1. It is a little vague on this sheet. Mr. Bourassa says:

[Translation]

After referring to the Supreme Court decision and the gains made, he stated:

As far as new provinces are concerned, I do not have to elaborate on the threat which the addition of new provinces would represent for Quebec's collective wealth especially in the regions where natural resources could become fully developed.

[English]

That is a direct quotation from Mr. Bourassa's remarks before the committee which, you will recall, sat after the Meech Lake Accord was signed but before the Langevin Block meeting took place. I also think there were some comments made in the National Assembly, but it would take me a little more time to find them.

Senator Fairbairn: So it was clear, then, from these comments that at Meech Lake the question of northern provincehood, and probably the extension of boundaries, was a live and specific issue, and not one that was forgotten in the discussions.

Mr. Johnston: No, I do not think that that was something that slipped between the cracks and that would be corrected in a second round.

Mr. Chairman, the other thing that I might say is that we must remember that the veto, by its very nature, creates a sort of constitutional horse-trading. For example, if agreement is to be obtained to allow a new province into the federation, as Mr. Schwartz might have said in his book or elsewhere, that veto is worth something to each premier who has agreed, so what is the quid pro quo? Is it a bit more territory? Is it a different federal-fiscal arrangement? Is it a causeway or whatever? It just lends itself to that kind of horse-trading that we have already seen take place around the table at Meech Lake.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Fairbairn. Next is Senator Gigantès, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Johnston, thank you for coming. I would like to say publicly that I admire very much your defence of Canada.

What do you think of the argument that if Meech Lake is rejected the social peace will be broken in Quebec? This is an argument that the Gazette has bought recently.

Mr. Johnston: Senator Gigantès—through you, Mr. Chairman—that argument has been used since the days of Mr. Duplessis and is now cropping up in the days of Mr. Bourassa. The threat of separatism raising its head was the basis of Mr. Duplessis' "two nations" theory that was, in a sense, adopted in the 1956 Tremblay commission report. It was very much part and parcel of Premier Lesage's notion of special status, "Maître chez nous," "état du Québec." It also related to the additional powers requested by Quebec, and if you go back and look at some of Mr. Lesage's comments you will find that he was pointing the province very much in the direction of Meech Lake and asking for the same sort of things.

Mr. Lesage was followed by Daniel Johnson with "égalité ou indépendance." He basically said: "Here we have two nations, and if we do not get this there will be 'égalité ou indépendance'."

The same threat was raised with "souveraineté association" by Mr. Lévesque and, I suppose, "national affirmation" from Pierre Marc Johnson, although that concept never really became especially well defined.

Therefore, the question is: Who is going to stand up to those demands made by a series of premiers who see themselves as acting in the best interests of their province? With the exception of the period when Mr. Clark was Prime Minister, although nothing took place that was of consequence on the constitutional front, this is the first time since Confederation—and I say this in a non-partisan way—that we have had a Prime Minister who basically, as I said recently, "marche la main dans la main avec M. Bourassa vers l'idée des deux nations." So that is the difference.

Senator Gigantès: Do you think that the peace will be broken?

Mr. Johnston: No, I do not think the peace will be broken. I think the important thing is for Quebecers to understand exactly what is at stake. We had to do that in 1980 during the referendum debate, and we did, and the peace was not broken. The problem is that, fundamentally, the people of Quebec are emotionally involved, although some have said that it is a non-issue with the man in the street in Quebec. However, I think if the people of Quebec understand what is at stake, and that this is a firm move towards the consolidation of the "two nations" theory; and ultimately sovereignty association, and ultimately a very useful and effective tool in the hands of a Péquiste government to move towards independence, they would appreciate full well that Meech Lake goes too far.

That is not to say that some resolution of the constitutional issue should not take place, as was proposed in the Liberal resolution of November 1986, which I and others at the time had understood would satisfy the desire of Quebecers—I being one of them, I might say—to have an identification—

[Translation]

—that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society which is the main source but not the exclusive source of the French language and culture in Canada.

● (1520)

[English]

That was a preambular comment. I think that something like that should be the compromise position.

Senator Gigantès: Could you once more address yourself to the argument that if the 11 First Ministers, with a great negotiator at their head, arrived at an agreement in so short a period of time when it was never done before, and if they can accomplish miracles, why should they not accomplish a miracle again and change parts of the agreement? In other words, the objection based on the need for unanimity is not valid if we have a miracle worker at the head of the negotiations.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, it is not hard to reach unanimity when you simply agree on how you are going to cut up the pie or the country. There was no give and take; there was only take in these negotiations. Would we have had unanimity if, for example, the federal government had insisted on defining spending power in a different way, if the federal government had said that it should be more involved in post-secondary education, or if the federal government had said that it should have a stronger role in terms of national securities and control? I do not think there would have been unanimity in these instances. Essentially, everybody walked away from Meech Lake thinking they had gotten something—except Canada!

Let me put a question to Senator Gigantès: What now would be given to Quebec to, for example, convince it to allow the formation of new provinces or to withdraw its veto in certain areas? I ask the Senate to bear in mind that Quebec has given nothing in these negotiations. I find it particularly upsetting when people say that Quebec has come wholeheartedly into the constitutional family. During the debate on the adoption of the Accord in the National Assembly on June 18 Mr. Bourassa, after citing a resolution of the Liberal Party with regard to the notion of self-determination, is reported as saying the following:

[Translation]

A resolution which had been adopted by the Liberal Party, which is still in effect and which is still part of the constitutional program of the Liberal Party. It was adopted at the policy conference in Montreal on February 29 and March 1 and 2, 1980... This resolution states that the Liberal Party recognizes the right of Quebec to determine its internal constitution and to express freely its will to maintain the Canadian federal union or to put an end to it. In other words, it recognizes the right of Quebecers to determine freely their own future. This was a resolution adopted by the Liberal Party in 1980, and it has been in no way amended—it is still part of the program—or affected by the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

Mr. Bourassa said—and I hope that you will read his comments—in the National Assembly that Quebec gave up nothing during these negotiations, that Quebec likes this deal, that Quebec will not abandon its position that it can leave the federation at any time.

[Translation]

If the federation is not really profitable.

[English]

So that is the great historic miracle that was worked at Meech Lake, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Frith: Mr. Johnston, I want to ask you about two subjects.

Mr. Chairman, if I am crowding any of my colleagues on my second question, I hope that you will let me know.

The Chairman: I have five other names on my list, which gives each questioner roughly five minutes.

Senator Frith: The two points I want to ask you about are: first, the reference you made to the report of the B & B Commission; and, second, the distinction between political and constitutional judgments you make in the paper you presented to the Ontario committee.

Dealing with the first point, you have cited the opinion of Professor Scott. The commission, in the first volume of its report, did a study on what it calls, in chapter 4, "the territorial principle and the personality principle." It studied four other countries with language regimes and language problems. Those countries were South Africa, Finland, Belgium and Switzerland. What triggered my interest in your earlier comment relates to the fact that Belgium took the territorial approach in its answer to the language regime question. Your position seemed to be that we should avoid, as the commission felt, that solution—that is, two unilingual territories. Would you expand on how you see Meech Lake creating that territorial principle rather than the personality principle which the B & B Commission chose?

Mr. Johnston: As a preamble, I would say that the issue of whether it should be territorial or whether it should be bilingually national is a legitimate area of debate. I happen to think, as the commission did, as the commissioner does and as the whole program that has been adopted does—

Senator Frith: In the Official Languages Act, for example.

Mr. Johnston:—that the territorial principle is wrong. I am galled by the fact that Meech Lake can lay the groundwork for a territorial division of language without the public effectively being involved in the debate or opting for the principle.

Senator Frith: That is the topic I would like you to direct your remarks to.

Mr. Johnston: The "distinct society" clause, combined with the role assigned to the National Assembly and to the Government of Quebec to promote the distinct identity of Quebec, in Premier Bourassa's mind, from citations I have read, is the basis of consolidating the French fact in Canada. That is my first point. Second, when one looks at the policies already adopted by Premier Bourassa in the absence of Meech Lake, whether it be on signing, on schooling, on dubbing of films, or whatever, one sees the elements of how Mr. Bourassa would like to see the whole thing evolve. Many Canadians think that you can have a unilingual Quebec in either an English Canada or perhaps a bilingual Canada. A unilingual Quebec in a bilingual Canada is another issue we can discuss. It is my view that the rest of the country will reject the notion of bilingualism if Quebec is unilingual. The reason I went to Professor Scott is that back in the late 1960s he made the observation that there were a growing number of Canadians who believe that one can survive in this country with a unilingual Quebec in an Anglophone Canada.

Senator Frith: It is not only the problem of survival within this country but of survival on this continent in such isolation.

Mr. Johnston: That is true. The other aspect which we have not really addressed today is that I believe, as Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Rémillard and others do, that there is indeed a transfer of jurisdictional authority in Meech Lake by virtue of the interpretative clause. Some constitutional experts say that it is only a clause of interpretation. Those of us who have studied constitutional law realize that many of the most important jurisdictions, including communications, for example, have resulted from judicial interpretation. I believe that the "distinct society" clause would give Quebec, certainly a Péquiste government, a very strong argument, which they have already tried, to establish its own control over all domestic communications, including content. So I think that there is a power transfer plus the notion of a unilingual French province.

• (1530)

Senator Frith: The second point, Mr. Johnston, has to do with the fact that, although we have this paper you sent us, I would like something from it on our record. Perhaps, therefore, you could give us a few sentences to develop what you have pointed out regarding the constitutional opinions of Professors Lederman and Hogg and their political opinions.

Mr. Johnston: I went into their writings and their testimony very carefully. It is clear that in both instances Professors Lederman and Hogg crossed over the line of constitutional law into the area of politics: Professor Lederman saying that this will make the process complete and Quebec will now legitimately come back to the table; and Professor Hogg saying that there was a deep sense of grievance in 1982 with the patriation. He said that there was a profound sense of grievance in Quebec and that it was terribly important that this be eliminated. I am not critical of anyone expressing a political opinion. The point is that their credentials as constitutional authorities should not add any weight to their views as amateur politicians. In my paper I took issue with Professor Hogg's analysis of the psyche of Quebec in 1981 and in 1982. I do not agree that there was a profound sense of grievance.

One of the points, Senator Frith, that I think senators should be aware of is that if one goes back to the provincial general election of 1985 between Premier Bourassa and Pierre Marc Johnson, who was then premier, one will find not one instance of a debate on the issue of the Constitution. If there was such a profound sense of grievance and such a priority in the minds of Quebecers, is it not unusual that there was not one word or one issue raised, except—and I have done a computer study of this—a question about what Mr. Rémillard's position might be in the Constitution, because he came in as a candidate? There was nothing about the five points at all. The only place it is found is in a document called "Mastering our Future", which is part of the election literature which is buried away; it is vague, it is not specific, and therefore Mr.

Bourassa, I say, has no mandate like Premier Frank McKenna has on Meech Lake.

Senator Frith: Just as a footnote on the purely constitutional side of the opinions of Professor Lederman and Professor Hogg, you also point out that they are not universally supported by other constitutional experts.

Mr. Johnston: Although I do not even purport to list them all, I do point out a few of those in my paper. For example, let me offer this interpretation. Professor Hogg believes that the promotion of the distinct society also means the promotion of English in Quebec. When I read that I cannot give it any credibility at all. Can you imagine the Supreme Court of Canada faced with a situation where the Meech Lake Accord says that other provinces are obliged only to preserve the existence of French-speaking Canadians, but in Quebec the Quebec government is to promote the distinct identity, which includes English-speaking Canadians? It is a non-starter, and Premier Bourassa certainly recognizes it as such, and so, in fact, does Professor Lederman.

The Chairman: I remind my colleagues that I have five names on the list and that we have 20 minutes left. The next questioner will be Senator Lang, followed by Senator Denis.

Senator Lang: Mr. Johnston, I would like for a moment to try to take you away from the idea that you are on a platform to the idea that you are addressing a Senate Committee of the Whole and to seek your advice as a lawyer and, I presume, a constitutional expert. I believe you were a member of the government in 1982, were you not?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, I was.

Senator Lang: At that time you will recall that our authority in respect to the amendments to the Constitution was curtailed with the agreement of what I would say, in my humble opinion, was a rather supine Senate reaction. You will remember how our powers were thus curtailed, will you not?

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Senator Lang: In other words, we have nothing more, with respect to Meech Lake, than a six-month suspension, and thereafter, if we do not pass—and I want to underline the next word—"such" a resolution, the House of Commons can thereafter repass the same resolution and it becomes law without our concurrence. What, under those circumstances, would you suggest that we, as a Senate, might do with respect to the recommendations and ideas that you are putting forward today?

Mr. Johnston: Senator Lang, I think the legal reality is that, in terms of stopping the Meech Lake process, only provincial legislatures now have that capacity. I am talking of a political reality, because the Conservative majority in the House of Commons has taken its position and made it clear, and the Senate does not have the means of stopping it.

But the issue that has concerned me most often in this debate has not been whether I am right or wrong or whether others are right or wrong, but that the process should be such that Canadians understand what is at stake in Meech Lake.

[Mr. Johnston.]

That is what the Senate can do and that is what the Senate is doing. I hope that is what the Senate will continue to do and that its report emerging from this, and the recommendations it may make with respect to amendments will be such that Canadians will sit up and take notice. I think that more and more have taken notice, but one of the great problems in this debate has been the conspiracy of silence amongst the political leadership of the country. We are now seeing some breach of that in Manitoba, with Sharon Carstairs taking this issue on, and, in fact, NDP members, as well, are very much opposed to Meech Lake. We also have Frank McKenna in New Brunswick. There are also the hearings in the Ontario legislature. All of these can make a contribution to raising the level of public awareness. I believe that if the public were aware of what is likely to happen as a result of Meech Lake public opinion would go strongly against it and people in a position politically to stop it would react accordingly.

Senator Lang: Following on that, I am again trying to bring you back from the public platform idea to the legal realities of the situation that we are in in the Senate. It does not say in the 1982 amendments that we should pass "the same" resolution as the House of Commons, it says "such" resolution. In your opinion, would that open it up to us to suggest amendments to that House of Commons resolution?

Mr. Johnston: In looking at the provisions, which I do not have in front of me, I have thought that the Senate would be perfectly free to make amendments to the resolution or to adopt another resolution and send it back to the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: No, under section 47, we cannot send it back. We pass our own resolution.

Mr. Johnston: It is not sent back, but the House of Commons then has to readopt the original resolution or, presumably, the resolution which you have adopted. When you say that you cannot send it back, I suppose that, technically, that is correct, but, in effect, you would be making them react to what you have done. If you adopt the resolution as presented to you, then that is the end of the matter, as I understand it. Your action here can determine whether it actually comes before the House of Commons again. That would be my reaction to your question. Then, of course, the House could take the recommendations that you make, modify the resolution and readopt it. However, the more likely scenario in the current climate is that they will adopt it in its present form.

Senator Lang: If the Senate were disposed to amend the resolution, in what specific regards would you consider it advisable for the Senate to do so?

Mr. Johnston: Senator Lang, that would be a long answer.

Senator Lang: Take your time.

● (1540)

Mr. Johnston: To be quite candid, and not to sound as though I am obdurate in my position on the Constitution, I see very little in the Meech Lake Accord that is good. I have gone through all of the provisions many times and I really see no improvement over the status quo; and I am very concerned about nearly every element of it, in terms of a one-way ratchet or one-way street to decentralization, in terms of the institutionalization of the First Ministers' conferences—because we have already seen what came back as a result of Meech Lake—in terms of the “distinct society” clause, which we have talked about here; in terms of the federal spending power; in terms of the opting out provision; in terms of the Supreme Court appointments, which I think—

An Hon. Senator: And Senate appointments?

Mr. Johnston: And in terms of Senate appointments. It is no accident, surely, Mr. Chairman—I say to you, to Senator Lang and to others who are prominent legal authorities in their own right—that the lawyers in this country are overwhelmingly opposed to the Meech Lake Accord—and with good reason.

Concerning the amendments, I really think that one has to go back to the drawing board, because one really cannot make a silk purse out of this sow's ear, in my judgment.

Senator Lang: Are you rather regretful that you may have supported the 1982 amendments that curtailed our powers in the constitutional area?

Mr. Johnston: There are many things that I regret over the years.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Next is Senator Denis, followed by Senator Lucier.

Senator Denis: Mr. Johnston, we are very glad to hear your testimony. We know from the votes taken in the other place that you object to the Meech Lake Accord.

If I am not mistaken, you said earlier that Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa used blackmail in trying to convince Mr. McKenna. You yourself are trying to oppose the Meech Lake Accord, but I would not say you are using blackmail to do so.

Am I right to say that you are trying to convince people it would be better not to adopt the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Johnston: Senator Denis, that is the impression I get from the media. It is true I wasn't there when Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa said openly that if you don't accept the Meech Lake Accord as is, you will create very fundamental social problems in Quebec. You will resurrect separatism, you will create another independence movement, and so forth. That is what I consider blackmail.

Senator Denis: When you say that Canada will go down the drain if the Accord is adopted, that isn't blackmail, of course. That is just an opinion.

You are using the decision made by Mr. McKenna, who represents one province out of ten, but you tend to forget the other premiers who also agree with the Accord. They signed it. They were not alone. They had their whole Cabinet. They were democratically elected in their respective provinces.

Today, what remains of the opposition to the Meech Lake Accord is about a dozen members in the House of Commons and maybe a few senators.

However, in addition to the other provinces in this country, Canada's three major political parties, the Conservatives, the Liberals and the New Democrats are represented and there are not many people left who are opposed to the Accord.

This reminds me of the story of the woman who was watching the troops march past and who told her friend: Look at my son, he's the only one who is in step! So we should not conclude that being for the Meech Lake Accord means the end of the world.

You said in your brief that it was a disaster. You put a great deal of emphasis on the province of New Brunswick and Mr. McKenna. The other provinces are not as important. The other premiers are not important. You also said that the election campaign in New Brunswick was run on the issue of the Meech Lake Accord. I don't think that is correct. In any case, there is always more than one issue in an election campaign.

Mr. Johnston: I would like to answer, if I may.

As far as I am concerned, the procedure we have followed so far is unacceptable. Our First Ministers met behind closed doors. Amongst themselves they made decisions about the future of this country, based on the discipline and credibility of each one when he signed the Accord, and that was it.

Mr. Mulroney said last week: They gave me their word, and I am counting on them. Quite obviously, Canadians had nothing to do with it.

Senator Denis: Well, Mr. Johnston—

Mr. Johnston: Senator Denis, with all due respect, please give me a chance to answer the question.

Senator Denis: The signing by the First Ministers will be followed by meetings and resolutions in each of the provinces. It is worth something.

Senator Frith: It has not been finalized yet.

Senator Denis: No, but it will.

Mr. Johnston: Listen. This would disregard the political reality.

We are well aware that party discipline requires that if the leader signs a resolution, everybody else must do so too.

In the case of Mr. McKenna, there is quite a big difference. I could provide you with quotes, for there are many other things. I can tell you that this was part of his election platform.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt you, but it is not really a debate that we are supposed to have, but rather questions and replies.

Mr. Johnston: An exchange.

May I add something?

The Chairman: Certainly, Mr. Johnston.

Mr. Johnston: When I visited Nova Scotia, I watched a debate between Mr. Hatfield and Mr. McKenna on the impact of the accord and the distinct society, as well as the connection between the two.

The New Brunswick people, therefore, knew quite well that Mr. McKenna was definitely against it, for the reasons he had explained.

Senator Denis: In conclusion, Mr. Johnston, almost unanimously throughout the country, those who are in office are in favour of the Meech Lake Accord. Those who are against might include a few senators and the 15 or 16 MPs who voted against it in the House of Commons.

Mr. Johnston: The Canadian people should also be involved. They have yet to say where they stand.

Senator Denis: Mr. Bourassa is doing all right in Quebec; he is ahead.

The Chairman: Any further questions, Senator Denis?

Senator Denis: Mr. Chairman, we cannot ask questions because when we do the witness launches a debate. Mr. Chairman, you do not want me to debate the issue.

The Chairman: I am asking you both not to debate the issue and, if possible, to limit yourselves to questions and answers.

Are you finished, Senator Denis?

Senator Denis: That is all, and I enjoyed it, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Denis.

[English]

Senator Lucier is next, followed by Senator Marsden and Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour).

Senator Lucier: Mr. Johnston, I am sure that you are aware of the betrayal and insult which northerners feel as a result of the Meech Lake Accord, with the way that the aboriginal people of the North have been treated; the fact that we have been relegated to second class citizen status. It has now been written into the Constitution that anyone who lives north of the 60th parallel is less Canadian than those who live south of the 60th parallel. I am sure that you are aware of all of those things.

We have been told about the fragility of the accord, the fact that it is a seamless web, and all the rest of it, and that we should wait for the second round of negotiations for corrections to be made. Do you see any chance for significant changes to the Constitution over the next 20 years, bearing in mind what the premiers have achieved this time around?

● (1550)

Mr. Johnston: No, senator. When we know that the treatment of the northerners and the aboriginal peoples was not accidental, why would we have any confidence that another First Ministers' conference would resolve the very obvious injustices which have been incorporated into the fundamental law of the land?

I might say, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, that I thought of bringing the many pieces of correspondence I have received from every part of this country respecting Meech Lake. I can assure Senator Denis that there are many people besides senators and members of the House of Commons opposed to Meech Lake. I have never received such a large amount of correspondence on any issue.

What concerns me is that most Canadians do not understand the nature of entrenchment. Most Canadians say, "Maybe it is terrible, but they will fix it up next year." Not everybody in the country is a constitutional lawyer. The message is not out there that Meech Lake is forever. The Senate could be helpful if it were to tell the people out there that this is not something we can revisit next year.

Senator Lucier: I agree with that.

The statement has been made by a couple of northerners that the premiers have won the pot, that there is no need to keep playing poker, because they have cleaned up on everything they wanted.

My second question also relates to Senate reform. I thought we were moving towards real Senate reform in this country. I thought the Canadian population had sent the message that they wanted Senate reform.

Do you see an opportunity of meaningful Senate reform now that we have the unanimity clause?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, there are many people in this chamber more experienced in politics than I am, but in my experience I cannot recall a politician voluntarily giving up power. The premiers have come out the big winners with the Meech Lake Accord, including their right to nominate people to the Senate. The idea of a premier abandoning that in the name of a Triple E Senate might fly in a political science classroom at the University of Toronto, but in the real world of politics that is just not going to fly.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Johnston, for a brief which is in such detail, and in which I note you state that the premiers have compromised constitutional safeguards for sexual equality rights. I am pleased to have that on the record.

Since you have not given us in your brief the benefit of your views on the kind of process which you think would be desirable in future constitutional reform, could you give us your views on that now? In view of the time constraints, if you wish to submit your views in writing later, I will ensure that they are placed on the record.

Mr. Johnston: I think I can reply briefly, Mr. Chairman. I do not have a fixed view, but I was attracted to the proposals made by Al Johnson when he recently appeared before this committee.

I have spoken to him about this matter. We have had previous discussions regarding the accord, but he did not raise those specifics in the past. I think that his ideas are well worth exploring. Given that we have created this mechanism of First Ministers' conferences, I think we have to pursue this matter and arrive at some national consensus. That is certainly a good point of departure, in my judgment.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, being a member of a minority, I always worry when people use majorities to justify a position. I think it was Paul Claudel, the French writer, who said that truth has nothing to do with the number of people who believe in it. I also think that "les moutons de Panurge" that jumped over the cliff were probably the majority in that field of sheep.

I worry because Mr. Johnston has raised the concerns of some minorities. Mr. Johnston spoke about the English minority in Quebec. Of course, some of us worry about the fact that, if you define Canada as a French Quebec and an English Canada, a million of us will be deprived of the feeling of citizenship, of equality and the possibility of survival.

How do you explain this move backwards when Canada was making such progress towards being fundamentally bilingual and consisting of many cultures? How do you explain this intolerance—and I do not like to use that word, but the term "paix sociale" has always worried me since I started my readings in the late 1930s and early 1940s?

Minorities in Canada did not survive by playing "la paix sociale." If we had played "la paix sociale" in New Brunswick we would still be in a situation where going to school in a totally French village meant that a pupil had to learn to read and write from English textbooks. That was not "la paix sociale" that we engaged in. In fact, Louis Robichaud, who sits on this front bench, did not practise "la paix sociale" when he brought in equal opportunity.

That is my speech, Mr. Chairman. I hear you rattling the glass.

Mr. Johnston: Do I have an opportunity to reply?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to say that probably millions of Canadians are as profoundly dismayed as you and I with what looks like a movement backwards, because so much seems to have been accomplished. There is no question that the level of tolerance in western Canada has increased. Those of us who have been on hotline shows recognize the difference immediately when we are in any of the western provinces.

All of this had been accomplished, I might say, speaking as a Liberal, at considerable political cost to the Liberal Party. Similarly, in Quebec it seemed that we finally had our linguistic act together. The Commissioner of Official Languages finds problems every year, just as the Auditor General does, but on each page of his reports one sees encouraging signs. There have been many demands for French immersion schools, but there are not enough schools to meet the demand, and that is not good.

When I was President of the Treasury Board, I was responsible for the administration of the Official Languages Act in the Public Service, and I do not like what I see happening in the Public Service today. I am profoundly dismayed by what I see taking place and this step backwards from the bilingual approach that has been successfully promoted over the past 20 years to entrench linguistic positions of the past. I think it is a great tragedy.

I hope that the report of the Senate and other reports will draw Canadians' attention to this and stir their social conscience once again on this issue so we can get back to where we were.

The Chairman: Mr. Johnston, I wish to thank you very much for taking the time to prepare the brief that you have left with us and for taking the time to appear before us today to share your views on this most important subject.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The next group of witnesses represents the Public Service Alliance of Canada. The Alliance was established in 1966 and has 180,000 members. It represents most federal government public servants. We welcome this afternoon Mr. Daryl T. Bean, National President, and Ms. Joane Hurens, Executive Vice-President.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Mr. Daryl T. Bean and Ms. Joane Hurens were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Will you both be speaking or will the presentation be made by one of you alone?

• (1600)

Mr. Daryl T. Bean, National President, Public Service Alliance of Canada: I will be doing most of the speaking, Mr. Chairman. Depending upon the questions, it may be necessary for my colleague to respond.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Bean. On behalf of all senators, I welcome you. Our normal procedure is to have a 15- or 20-minute statement by the witness, followed by questions. We have an hour at our disposal, and if you are ready please proceed.

Mr. Bean: Thank you. On behalf of the 180,000 members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, I would like to thank the Committee of the Whole for inviting our participation in the Senate deliberations on the Meech Lake Accord. Late last summer the Alliance appeared before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons that was established to pronounce upon the accord. At that time we joined with organizations representative of Canadian women, Canada's North, Canadian aboriginal people, and other labour organizations in a critique of some of the specific aspects of the accord. It becomes clear from a reading of the Special Joint Committee's report that the legitimate concerns of organizations representative of millions of Canadians were either not heard or, worse still, were consciously ignored by the members of the committee. Hence, our purpose in appearing before the Committee of the Whole this afternoon is primarily to reiterate what we have said before—to press upon senators the fact that the Constitution belongs to the Canadian people, and not to the 11 men whom the Prime Minister has referred to as the modern Fathers of Confederation.

First, as a national union, the Alliance has the privilege of representing some 5,000 workers employed in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Our members resident in Canada's North have joined with the northern majority in the campaign against the accord's requirement that henceforth 11 First Ministers and their parliaments must concur before a new province can be created. On their behalf, we should like to congratulate the Senate and its Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and the Northwest Territories for its comprehensive recommended amendments related to the constitutional rights of Canada's North and its people. Second, in our formal submission to the Special Joint Committee last summer the Alliance lauded the goal that gave rise to the accord, while amending many of its specific clauses.

Representing, as we do, some 31,000 members who reside in the province of Quebec, the PSAC wholeheartedly supports the profound desire on the part of the Prime Minister to have Quebec become a signatory to the Constitution rather than remain bound by law to a constitutional instrument with which it disagreed. We accept without reservation the distinctive nature of Quebec's society within the Canadian Constitution and have no qualms about the expression of that distinctiveness. We find it hard to accept, however, that the accord provides for the transfer of power to all provinces, particularly with regard to federal spending power and immigration.

As all senators are undoubtedly aware, your current review of the Meech Lake accord represents the last opportunity at the federal level for critics of that accord to present their views and to correct the many misrepresentations contained in the report of the Special Joint Committee. While we can understand the pressure of time faced by the Senate, it is, in our view, unfortunate that the Senate has decided to invite some groups and individuals to appear before a small submissions group while others gain access to the attention of the full Senate. We find it disturbing that the Alliance is the only union to be granted an appearance before the Committee of the Whole and, similarly, that the Women's Legal Education Action Fund is the only national women's group to be so invited. Those so selected shoulder an additional obligation to attempt to represent the interests of a broader constituency than they would normally represent. As the president of an affiliate of the Canadian Labour Congress and a union representing 90,000 Canadian women, I am privileged to accept this responsibility. However, as I have said, it would have been preferable for the Senate to have heard all witnesses on an equal footing.

As was stated in our formal submission, the Alliance believes the accord to be frequently imprecise and ambiguous. The imprecision and ambiguity has led us to the conclusion that the accord must either be subject to substantial amendments now or be open to protracted and costly litigation later.

With respect to clarity, or the lack thereof, in the constitutional language, the PSAC knows of what it speaks. In our formal submission we addressed at length the interpretation of "freedom of association" that was imparted to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution by the acting Minister of Justice on January 22, 1981, when he stated that freedom of association included "freedom to organize and bargain collectively." Subsequently, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a majority decision related to Bill C-124, the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act, which decision was rendered on April 9, 1987, came to the conclusion that the Charter guarantees unions neither the right to collective bargaining nor the right to strike.

Our purpose in recounting these two contradictory episodes in Canadian constitutional history is threefold. First, words on paper and the interpretation placed upon them can be contradicted with resultant dire consequences. Therefore, considerable care must be taken when crafting a legal document of the importance of the Constitution. Second, we believe that constitutionally guaranteed freedoms must recognize collective rights in addition to individual rights. Specifically, freedom of association must not simply protect the rights of individuals to associate but must, at the same time, protect the legitimate purposes and objectives of the association. Third and finally, we believe that the current debate on the accord, following so closely on the heels of the Supreme Court judgment in respect of Bill C-124, provides Parliament with an opportunity—a unique opportunity—to correct the interpretation that has been placed on the right of freedom of association since Parliament last debated the Constitution in 1981-82. We have, therefore, proposed an amendment to subsection 2(d) of the Constitution Act, 1982 that would explicitly recognize freedom to organize and bargain collectively. We do not believe that this amendment will be problematic. In fact, we believe that this can be accomplished without placing other aspects of the accord in jeopardy.

In this regard, it is instructive to note that the Charter is being interpreted in a manner that was never intended. Even Roy Romanow, who, as the Attorney General of Saskatchewan, helped to write it, has been quoted as being surprised and dismayed to find that the Charter has Americanized our justice system and endangered the rights of labour unions.

In a similar vein, in its formal submission the Alliance urges consideration of an amendment to subsection 2(b) of the Charter, explicitly recognizing the right of all Canadians to participate in the political process. Such a provision would have the effect of removing a restriction—a substantial restriction—placed upon federal public sector workers by section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act. Such an amendment is completely consistent with the constitutional reform, since the removal of the restriction on the rights of political participation is supported by Canadians at large. In my view, the failure of the Special Joint Committee to comment on these two issues at all did a disservice to all Canadian workers. I hope that the Senate adopts a different posture and recommends, at the very least, that these issues be the subject of discussion at a future constitutional conference.

Since it was signed by Canada's First Ministers on June 3, 1987, the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord has been subject to scrutiny from a number of constitutional experts who are alarmed at the ambiguity in the accord. We share that concern and are particularly disturbed by the language's inconsistency as between the sections of the accord dealing with the spending power and those dealing with immigration.

One does not have to be a legal or constitutional expert to conclude that, because the accord refers to "national standards and objectives" in one section and "national objectives" in another, the courts will interpret "national objective" as being something different from and probably less than "national standards and objectives." A similar situation will prevail vis-à-vis "not repugnant" and "compatible."

Like many Canadians, we find the Special Joint Committee's conclusion in this regard to be alarming. The report states:

The drafting of this section may not be a picture of perfection, but this is likely one of the areas where some ambiguity was the price of agreement. We are not prepared to reject the section or call for changes in its language simply on the grounds that some of the language is ambiguous. We believe that the courts will be able to work out the interplay of concepts in the concrete fact situations that come before them.

In the first instance, we believe that, to the extent possible, members of the House of Commons and the Senate have a responsibility to be as clear as possible. In my view, members and senators should not defer to the courts on such fundamental questions, particularly considering the time and cost of legal proceedings.

While the accord is sometimes contradictory and ambiguous, the clarity of other sections is equally alarming. In this regard, we are particularly concerned with the provision in the chapter dealing with spending power that provides for the establishment of a national shared-cost program by cabinet or executive decree, without reference to Parliament. If this eventuality is what the 11 First Ministers intended, it is without question a travesty of Canadian democracy.

● (1610)

Likewise, the Alliance is incredulous that the federal government is willing to grant ten provinces enhanced power vis-à-vis immigration in response to what we conclude must have been a "me-too" refrain from the provinces other than Quebec. We simply cannot understand why a government—a sovereign nation state—could abdicate its clear constitutional primacy in an area as important as immigration. Moreover, as a union representing the bulk of federal public sector workers employed by Employment and Immigration Canada, we are alarmed at the potential provincialization of immigration administration and services. As senators are undoubtedly aware, the storm of public protest that followed the signing of the Meech Lake Accord focused primarily on the effects of the accord on equality rights. The position articulated by a variety of women's groups, and which, incidentally, was supported by the Alliance in its formal submission, is that section 16 will likely result in the establishment of a hierarchy of rights should the court at some point be asked to provide an interpretation of its meanings. Such an eventuality cannot be tolerated or allowed to occur, because it would serve to erode the individual and collective protections provided under the Charter.

In support of the positions that have been advanced before you, and on behalf of the 90,000 women members of the Alliance, I urge the senators to reject the cavalier treatment afforded this fundamental issue by members of the Special Joint Committee. I urge you, instead, to insist that the accord is amended to ensure beyond a shadow of a doubt that section 16 of the accord does not call into question the legitimacy of other equally important Charter rights.

As committee members will appreciate, it is difficult to summarize the tenor and tone of a 31-page submission in 15 minutes. Inevitably some items get short shrift while the complexity of the argument in others is lost. Nevertheless, I am more than willing to elaborate on the Alliance's position in response to any questions you may have.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Bean. Before I go to the questioners, I would like to clarify a point that you made in your presentation at the outset. You referred to the fact that you are being heard here while other groups have not been heard here. Let me assure you that the selection process was eminently fair. It was based on first come-first served. Your presentation, as you recall, was sent to us in August of 1987. Therefore, you were on the early list. The cutoff was sometime in October of 1987. After that, it was impossible because of considerations of time to hear everyone in this forum. The Senate then established a submissions group.

Mr. Bean: I appreciate that. My concern, of course, was that, because the Constitution is such an important document, as many people as possible should have an opportunity to be heard. I was not trying to be overly critical of what you have done, by any stretch of the imagination.

The Chairman: I simply wanted to point that out so that other people would understand that we did not discriminate against anyone.

The first senator on my list is Senator Lucier, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Bean and Ms. Hurens, I would like to congratulate you on the presentation that you have made and on the amount of work that you have put into your brief. We appreciate the time you have taken to come here and appear before us.

On page 31 of your brief you say:

Finally, we believe that the language of the Accord is insufficiently precise and ambiguous.

May I suggest to you that that may not be the case. We have been told by Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that the accord reflects exactly what the premiers wanted it to reflect, that they knew exactly what was in it. I do not think it was ambiguous or imprecise in their minds. I think it says exactly what they wanted it to say, which is an argument that northern Canada especially has put forth with some vigour, I can assure you.

You said that you represent 90,000 women, but how many members do you represent in total?

Mr. Bean: One hundred and eighty thousand.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Bean, the political reality is that this Meech Lake Accord is going to be a tough thing to stop. We are certainly hopeful that Premier McKenna will be able to at least delay it for some period of time until a couple of other premiers get some backbone. In the meantime, I have been searching out any method that I can think of to find a way to stop this accord. As I am sure you realize, the North is very offended by it.

You must have a large number of members in Manitoba. There is a provincial election taking place in Manitoba. The accord is an insult to women, to the unions, and to the aboriginals. Why are you not taking a political stand that you will not support anyone who supports the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Bean: The first difficulty that we run into is with section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act. I can tell you point blank that we are suggesting our members ignore the law. That is not something that we do lightly, but for many years we have been promised that this legislation would be changed.

Generally speaking, members tend to be afraid to ignore the law, because they can be fired for doing so. Certainly we will be raising the issue during the election campaign through those staff members in Manitoba who choose to ignore the law. The position we will be taking—as we have taken all along—is that the Meech Lake Accord should be rejected or substantively amended. If the government insists that it cannot be substantively amended, then we suggest that it should be rejected.

We do not do that lightly. I think it is very important that Quebec be brought into the Constitution. At the same time, in our view this is too high a price to pay. We have raised concerns about the North; we have raised concerns about the rights of women, particularly equality rights provisions; we have raised concerns about the spending powers; we have raised concerns about immigration, which I covered briefly and which is more fully covered in the brief. To some degree, we will certainly be involved in the Manitoba election. Again, it is a question of how many of our members are prepared to defy a law when such action might eventually lead to their being fired.

Senator Lucier: Does section 32 prevent your organization from taking political stands, or does it just prevent your members from taking part in political activity?

Mr. Bean: Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act only deals with the members. However, there is a section—I believe it is section 39 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act—which prevents our union from endorsing or supporting a political party or a candidate. Nevertheless, in that situation, I can tell you that we have reached the stage where we are prepared, as a union, to ask our members to support openly candidates who support issues that we believe in, despite the fact that that may well mean that some day down the road we will be before the courts with a decertification prospect.

Senator Lucier: If the clause prevents you from supporting a political party, will it also prevent you from saying that you do not support a political party? There may be a way around that that you have not looked at yet.

Mr. Bean: Unfortunately, the clause is all encompassing, because you cannot work for or against a political party or candidate. It covers both ends of it. We have had members successfully disciplined for that very fact.

The difficulty that we have with that is that they get you coming and going, because if you start to participate in the political process, then the employer can tell you that you must cease participating in that political process; if you refuse to cease participating in that political process, then they can charge you with insubordination, and as a result of that you can be fired, period. So they have us coming and going at this stage. That is why you have not seen many Public Service workers participating in the election process openly. That is not to say that many have not participated in the political process—and every political party knows that.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Bean, I would like to end by saying that no one in Canada wants to see this Meech Lake Accord, as it is presently written, go down more than I do.

Having said that, I would also like to say to you that, while I encourage you to do everything within the law to object to Meech Lake, I would certainly not like to see you do anything to break the law to support Meech Lake; I do not think two wrongs make a right. Thank you.

Mr. Bean: I agree with you to that degree. We did not take this decision lightly a number of months ago. We have been promised for 15 years or more that the legislation would be amended. There was agreement from all political parties that the legislation would be amended to provide Public Service workers who belonged to unions the right to participate in the political process. We think 15 years is long enough to wait. I do not take this process lightly, and it is regrettable that it is necessary for a union to urge its members to take that type of action, but, if that is the only way that we can get the law changed, so be it; we will live with the consequences.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Lucier. Next is Senator Frith, followed by Senator Fairbairn.

Senator Frith: I want to ask you about two subjects. One arises out of your large membership of 180,000. I do not know whether you were here when Mr. Johnston was giving evidence, and whether you heard his evidence, but he and others are concerned about the level of awareness in the Canadian population of the provisions of Meech Lake and its effects.

Obviously, you are closely focused on Meech Lake—from your presentation it is quite apparent—but can you tell me, in your opinion, the extent of awareness, first, among your membership? Did you say that you are a member of the congress?

Mr. Bean: Yes.

Senator Frith: So that would put you on the board of the congress and in touch with its larger membership. What do you think the general awareness is?

Do not make me feel good by saying that it is higher than you really believe it to be. I would like as accurate a report as you can give as to your perception of the extent of awareness of Meech Lake among your members and the congress members.

Mr. Bean: In both situations, to be quite honest, it is limited. I suspect if somewhere between 5 and 10 per cent of our members, as well as the members of the Canadian Labour Congress, have any significant knowledge—I will not even say extensive, but significant knowledge—I would be surprised. While we try to bring the concerns to our membership—in our next edition we will have an article on the Meech Lake Accord to bring it to the attention of the membership—let us face it, a whole lot of Canadians have other things they worry about, like bread and butter on the table these days, and so on, more than the Constitution. I wish it was not that way, because I happen to view the Constitution as being an extremely important document. So I wish I could say otherwise, but I would not be truthful if I said it amounted to any more than 5 to 10 per cent.

Senator Frith: Thank you for that candour.

Do you think that your membership is more aware of your position on the relationship between Meech Lake and the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike than it is on the other aspects of the accord?

Mr. Bean: Yes. There is no question about that. Because of the Supreme Court decision on April 9, 1987, they would be more aware of the fact that freedom of association does not cover, according to a majority decision of the Supreme Court, the collective bargaining rights which we anticipated were covered, and, certainly based on Mr. Kaplan's statement, we believed to be covered prior to that decision.

Senator Frith: That brings me to the second part of my question. It has two sub-parts.

I want to talk about section 16 and then section 2. On section 16, you have been keeping up, I take it, with the position of the persons concerned with aboriginal rights and women's rights as affected by section 16; is that right?

Mr. Bean: Yes; we have tried to keep abreast of any presentations that have been made by either group.

Senator Frith: So your concern would be the same as theirs, namely, that, although section 16 refers to specific items in the Charter that are not overridden by Meech Lake, others may be overridden by Meech Lake, which, in turn, if you managed to get section 2 amended, would affect you, because, conceivably, the "distinct society" clause could override that also. Is that too complicated, or are you following me?

Mr. Bean: No; I follow what you are saying. Certainly we are concerned that, yes, section 16 may well override the existing sections 15 and 28 of the Charter. I must confess that we did not put much thought into whether that would override the amendment, if we were successful with section 2, though. However, for the major part, we represent federal government workers. Thus, I would think that, taking that specific aspect by itself, it would probably not interfere in those particular circumstances, but it might in others.

● (1630)

Senator Frith: With respect to those who are concerned with women's rights, aboriginal rights and, to some extent, multicultural rights, if they are right about section 16 in the sense that because of the specific mention of some of the rights other rights are affected, then you could find yourself with section 2 amended, but still be overridden by section 16.

Mr. Bean: I would not doubt that that is possible, senator.

Senator Frith: Therefore, let us turn to what you think should be done with section 2. Perhaps, if it is not too complicated, you would put it right on the record to save an interested party having to look at the appended documents.

Section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1982 says:

Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

Then dropping down to (d):

(d) freedom of association.

Which was held by the Supreme Court of Canada not to include the right to collective bargaining or the right to strike. Am I right?

Mr. Bean: That is correct.

Senator Frith: Can you tell us what you want to add there to that section?

Mr. Bean: On page 8 of our submission you will find a proposed amendment, under paragraph 19, which states:—

Senator Frith: Just a second, let me get that. Page 8, paragraph 19?

Mr. Bean: Yes:

(d) Freedom of association, including the freedom to organize, bargain collectively and strike.

Having said that—

Senator Frith: Perhaps you would read that whole paragraph into the record, because it is not very long.

Mr. Bean: Very well:

As a result, we would recommend to Members of the Committee an amendment to Section 2 (d) of the Constitution Act of 1982 to the effect that:

(d) Freedom of association, including the freedom to organize, bargain collectively and strike.

I might add that we recognize that section 1 of the Charter of Rights remains, which means that the other sections can be overridden if it is demonstrably justified. We recognize that.

Senator Frith: Yes, that goes for all sections. That is in the Charter, and you do not want any special exception from that?

Mr. Bean: No, senator.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. Mr. Bean, I wonder if I could ask you a supplementary question on that.

Your view is that there would be no exceptions to the right to bargain collectively and strike.

Mr. Bean: Not without instituting section 1, which would require that it be demonstrably justified. In other words, there is a possibility that it would be overridden, but in order to do that section 1 would need to be used, and section 1 is a much tighter provision than anything that currently exists.

The Chairman: But there would be no exceptions for certain types of worker or anything like that.

Mr. Bean: Again, it may well be that one could demonstrably justify that workers performing certain functions or essential services of some sort might well not have the right to strike. I do not argue that. As a matter of fact, our position as a union has been very clear that, even if we had the right to strike in all of our bargaining units, there are certain groups which we clearly recognize would not have the right to strike. For instance, with respect to hospital workers, it would be important to take steps to see that people would not die because of lack of service. Firefighters at airports would be another group that would fall into this same category. It is obvious that we would have to make sure that there were sufficient firefighters on the job at all times so that if there was an aircraft that had an emergency situation it would be taken care of. Obviously we recognize that there must be the capability of providing that essential service. Therefore, my answer is yes, there would be certain groups or certain individuals who would be excluded.

I might add that this used to be the case under the Public Service Staff Relations Act prior to a Supreme Court decision in 1981-82. That was a decision in the case of the Canadian air traffic controllers, and at that time the Supreme Court decided that the Public Staff Relations Act required that if any part of the duties of any particular group could at any time be considered to be essential services, those employees would be so designated for the safety and security of the public.

An example of that might well be our general labour and trades people who clean the runways. I can well understand that at least one runway must be kept clear of snow in the wintertime. However, I have a hard time understanding how someone who snowploughs a runway needs to be in July, in this country, designated for the safety and security of the public. There are not too many areas in this country where we get snow in July.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, may I ask for clarification on that point?

Mr. Bean, I take it that what you are saying to the chairman is that a possible sequence could be that a law would be passed, saying that the following workers shall not have the right to strike, let us say. Then the amendment that you have given us would be included. That law would then be challenged as being unconstitutional, because it offends the new section 2(d).

Mr. Bean: That is correct.

[The Chairman.]

Senator Frith: Then the lawyers for the government would try to persuade the court that, although it does offend against section 2(d), it is a reasonable limit prescribed by law, as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Mr. Bean: Exactly.

Senator Frith: And you would accept that sequence.

Mr. Bean: No question.

Senator Frith: If the court so held.

Mr. Bean: That is correct.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. The next questioner is Senator Fairbairn, followed by Senator Gigantès.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Senator Frith really touched on the area that I had intended to ask you about in terms of section 16. I appreciate your comments on the degree to which this could create a hierarchy of rights and perhaps put in jeopardy the question of equality rights.

In your brief you talk about an amendment concerning the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, and I am wondering whether an amendment which would declare that the Charter has precedence in terms of interpreting the accord and the Constitution would satisfy your concerns as well as would the specific suggestion you have made in your brief.

Mr. Bean: I believe that it must be clearly spelled out, and we have taken the example of one area—namely, sections 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter as it now exists—which deals with equality rights. I think it should be very clearly spelled out in the accord that the “distinct society” provision cannot overrule those Charter provisions.

It may well be that there are other Charter provisions that should take precedence over that. I have not really dealt at any length with other areas, but certainly, while we do not quarrel with the “distinct society” approach, it must be clear that there are certain rights—including equality rights—that that “distinct society” provision cannot overrule. There may be others; I would not say that there are not.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Fairbairn. The next questioner is Senator Gigantès, followed by Senator LeBlanc, Beauséjour.

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Bean, would you add mobility rights to the list of essential rights to be protected?

Mr. Bean: To be honest, I have not dealt with the mobility rights aspect, but it is certainly one of the areas that I think should seriously be considered. I must admit that I have not seriously studied that aspect of it personally.

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Bean, within Quebec itself, if you are a carpenter in the Lac St. Jean area, you cannot go and practise as a carpenter in Montreal, at least not officially. That has always bothered me in terms of Charter rights, and I have always wondered why the labour unions have not challenged this situation. This does not even involve movement from province to province; it is within the same province.

● (1640)

Mr. Bean: As I have said, we have not looked at that aspect. Certainly it is a valid concern and it should be looked at. This is one of the reasons why I am concerned with the rush the Prime Minister seems to be in to get this accord through. It seems to me that when dealing with the Constitution we should not be in a rush to proceed with these types of changes. I think we should sit down and take a serious look at the whole question of mobility rights. I must admit that we have not taken this action. Not only do we have problems of jurisdiction within Quebec but we have problems right here as between Hull and Ottawa. I think the matter should be looked at for sure.

Senator Gigantès: You raised the issue of spending power. Spending power would also affect mobility rights. For example, if one province has a decent day-care system and another does not, the mobility of a young mother is reduced if she is going from one province with good child care to one with unsatisfactory child care, as one might expect from, say, Premier Vander Zalm in British Columbia. Have you studied this point at all? Have you discussed it?

Mr. Bean: We have discussed it as it relates to our concern about the accord being ambiguous and unclear. When you talk about spending power you must talk in terms of national objectives, which are not really defined. With regard to immigration, they talk about national standards and objectives, which obviously means something more than national objectives, but I am not sure what it means. If you look at the whole aspect of spending power, you begin to realize that there is really no precision with regard to what a national program such as child care might entail. One wonders how many provinces have to be involved in the child care program to make it a national program. If only one or two provinces are involved, is it a national program? How does the accord affect accessibility, affordability and universality? None of these aspects has been addressed. The accord is very imprecise and ambiguous in many areas, and we are concerned about it. We have looked at the accord in the sense that if some of the more progressive provinces institute good child care programs, which I expect they will, what will happen when you go to one of the provinces like B.C., as you mentioned, which is not known these days for being very progressive on anything? What kind of child care program will you get under the government there? I believe that clear minimum standards that address accessibility, affordability and universality of national programs should be established, if the federal government is going to provide funds for provincial governments.

Senator Gigantès: The Honourable Don Johnston, who appeared before you, said that at least some aspects, such as the veto power of the provinces with regard to the territories gaining provincehood, were not entered in the accord by inadvertence but were put there on purpose, with some premiers knowing precisely what they were asking. Do you see any evidence of this in other fields? We have been told that the accord is a seamless web, that no matter how many faults we can find we cannot touch it.

Mr. Bean: I have no doubt that the words in the accord were deliberately put there by the premiers and the Prime Minister. I do not doubt that there was compromise; otherwise, they would not have taken the position that you cannot change one word in this constitutional accord. On page 23 of our brief we address the suggestion that shared-cost programs be established by the Government of Canada. We are not talking here about the Parliament of Canada but about the Government of Canada. I think that this is a very serious and deliberate provision. The Parliament of Canada should determine the minimum objectives of any shared-cost national program, not the Government of Canada through cabinet or by some executive decree. I think that this provision totally abrogates the rights of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Gigantès: Do you think that the Prime Minister gave away powers both of the federal government and of Parliament at Meech Lake?

Mr. Bean: There is no question whatsoever that a number of federal powers were given away in the Meech Lake Accord, and we have talked about some of them—for example, the national cost-sharing programs, equality rights, and so on. Another area that concerns me is that of immigration. Prior to the Constitutional Accord, immigration policy was worked out in consultation with provincial governments, and any agreement could not be repugnant to any act of the Parliament of Canada. This process has now been changed. The provision in the accord says that it is compatible to the existing process, but, in my submission, there is a significant difference. I think that to get the accord the Prime Minister of this country is giving away rights that should be retained by the national sovereign state of Canada and the Parliament of this country, not the government of the day.

Senator Gigantès: When it comes to the rights in the Charter, would you say that the rights of individual citizens have also, to some extent, been jeopardized and sacrificed, or, at least, that the protection accorded to them before the accord has been diluted?

Mr. Bean: Yes. This traditional federal government right has been transferred to the provincial governments, and I believe that it will interfere with some of the rights of individuals.

Senator Gigantès: Do you see any connection between this Meech Lake Accord and Canada being able to withstand or to play a strong role in the forthcoming negotiations with the Americans about "harmonizing" the playing field? If the playing field is a football field, you can say that Canadians occupy from the goal line to the ten-yard line and the Americans occupy the rest of the field. Of course, the tendency will be to "harmonize" to ten elevenths. Does the Meech Lake Accord weaken the federal government's stance in this major set of negotiations it faces?

Mr. Bean: I believe that it does weaken the government's stance. I am not in a position to know, but I believe that the whole Free Trade Agreement was on the table in those discussions on the Meech Lake Accord, and it probably resulted in some of the compromises we see in the accord. Obviously I am in no position to confirm that, but there is no question in my mind that some of the changes in the Meech Lake Accord probably contributed to some of the provinces coming on side on the issue of free trade. Certainly, in my view, the two are interlinked and are very detrimental to Canada.

● (1650)

Senator Gigantès: If what you are presuming is so, that is, that this was done entirely in secret, how do you feel about the business of the people of Canada, the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures having absolutely no insight as to what deals were made and whether the country wanted those deals?

Mr. Bean: To be very blunt about it, I think the whole process was an insult to the Canadian people. I believe that when we are talking about a document as important as the Constitution of this country, as a very minimum, any government—and I do not care who the government is—should at least start with some type of green discussion paper, move up to getting input by holding meetings across the country, whether it be by way of parliamentary committees or otherwise, to get input from Canadians, and then they should move to the white paper process so that Canadians will have had an ample opportunity to have input into their Canadian Constitution. As I said before, the Constitution does not belong to 11 elected people of this country, it belongs to all Canadians and it should be debated by them.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The last questioner on my list is Senator LeBlanc, Beauséjour.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Earlier our witness made the point—and I am not quarrelling with him—that perhaps the Constitution was not a bread and butter issue. I must say that for some of us—and I have a few scars to show—who fought for the fishermen's right to organize in provinces where, by law, they could not, it was a bread and butter issue.

I raise that subject with you because you raised the question of the judgment on the right of association and the interpretation of that. I must say that, as one who sat at the table when many of these discussions took place, certainly none of us ever envisaged that the right to association dealt with anything other than the protection of citizens who wanted to get together and associate in whatever form they chose and that it would eventually be interpreted as it was. If that had been the case, I am sure there would have been some amendments to the draft resolution before it went forward. On that point, you have a fair number of friends in this room and elsewhere.

I do not want to be garrulous with you, but I must say that, although the Constitution is a subject for legal discussion, it is also a part of the political process, and that is why I am surprised that you did not raise much more hell than you did in the party whose leader is applauded every year at C.L.C. congress meetings, who was so quick to come out and give so much away to provincial premiers who, in the area of right of association, I suspect, have very regressive views. I wonder why your friends in the NDP did not, in fact, bargain more than they did and why they seem to have given so much away. I say that, recognizing that my own party leader supported the Meech Lake Accord, but, then, I have to say that there is a saving grace in that all the Liberal members of Parliament from the three maritime provinces opposed it. I think they did that because of the fear of a weaker spending power. The loss of the support of the spending power is obviously very important to maritimers. This is a political discussion and this is a political institution. I am not a lawyer. Why did you not burn Mr. Broadbent's feet a little bit more than you did?

Mr. Bean: Mr. Broadbent is certainly well aware of the Public Service Alliance of Canada's position with regard to the Meech Lake Accord. We have made no bones about that. We think they erred; we believe to this day that they erred; and we have told them so.

I cannot speak for all of the other unions, but I can tell you that other unions are certainly in disagreement with the Meech Lake Accord and have so expressed those views. As to whether they have personally done anything else with regard to the NDP position, I cannot say, but I can certainly tell you that we have made it very clear both in meetings with Mr. Broadbent and via correspondence with him that we are upset and that we are not happy, by any stretch of the imagination, with their endorsing the Meech Lake Accord.

He has tried to explain some of the reasons why they have, and I do not accept them. I still think he is wrong.

I am not shying away from the political aspect of this. Three parties have endorsed the Meech Lake Accord, and certainly, while there has been some fudging since, I understand that all three parties will still endorse it, at least officially. While there may be some fudging, that is about as far as it goes.

I want to address the other issue you raised about what I said regarding individual members not necessarily seeing this as a bread and butter issue. I agree with you that it certainly is. I think the Constitution, and particularly the aspect of freedom of association, is a very clear bread and butter issue, because legislation like Bill C-124 can be passed, legislation which not only took away our right to bargain for two to three years, depending on which group was involved, but which rolled back signed collective agreements that were signed by the government. I must admit that rather shook my faith in the justice system, because I did not believe that the justice system in this country would allow a government to renege on signed collective agreements.

However, despite all that, it is very difficult to get to individual members and convince them that this or some other provision that we are fighting for in the arena, such as political rights, is just as important to them as this round of negotiations. It is very difficult to convince individual members that this type of thing is important, but, nevertheless, we do try.

[Mr. Bean.]

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): If I were playing poker I would be tempted to say, "How else would you have gotten such a good dental plan?" However, that is another issue.

Mr. Bean: I agree with you.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Do you think that, if the Meech Lake Accord goes ahead and there is the requirement for unanimity on so many major subjects, you will ever get an amendment that will really guarantee the freedom to bargain and the freedom to strike as a formal document of the Constitution, and the correction of a situation which no one could foresee in 1982?

Mr. Bean: When you talk about no one foreseeing a situation in 1982, I would point out that an amendment was proposed in 1982. That is what I alluded to when I referred to Mr. Kaplan's statement, which is found on page 3 of our brief. The amendment was proposed, but it was determined by Mr. Kaplan, who was sponsoring the bill, that there was no need for amendment.

To answer your first question, there is no question in my mind that if this accord goes through the chance of ever getting unanimity in terms of an agreement to amend the Constitution in that area, or in many other areas, is almost nil. I suspect that we shall have Vander Zalm's in government somewhere across this country.

● (1700)

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Bean. That concludes the questioning. On behalf of the committee, I thank you both for preparing your brief and sharing your views with us this afternoon. It has been very helpful on this most important subject.

Honourable senators, this concludes the hearing of witnesses for this afternoon. Is there a motion that the committee rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again on Wednesday, March 30, 1988.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-116, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its twenty-third report, respecting Bill C-60, an act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, with certain amendments.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2936.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Sinclair, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 29th March, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

IMMIGRATION

ANTICIPATED DATE OF PRESENTATION OF REPORTS OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ON BILLS C-55 AND C-84

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Neiman in her capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I will add, Senator Neiman, that I did not say anything important, so you did not miss much while you were going back to your seat.

My question is based on two facts. First, the fact that Bill C-84 was sent to the Senate on September 14 or 15, 1987 and, after the odd incidents, as we recall, it is still under consideration by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Second, the fact that Bill C-55 came to the Senate after it was adopted by the Commons on October 22, and that it is still being considered by the same committee after more than five months.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You forgot the intermission in the case of Bill C-84.

Senator Tremblay: I did suggest there was an intermission by referring to the odd incidents we all recall. I could have been more specific by describing to-and-fro traffic between the Senate and the House of Commons, but I chose to do so implicitly.

Senator Frith: We got it in February, not September. The second time, Bill C-84 was before the committee since February.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, it had gone through committee at an earlier stage. If you will, I added up the total time the Senate took to study this bill, because the intervening incidents resulted from the work of the Senate, if I may put it that way.

As to Bill C-55 it goes back to October, and since today is March 25 it is over five months since the bill first came to the Senate.

So my question is simply this: When can we expect the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to report on the two bills, C-84 and C-55?

[English]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have before me material that explains the history of these two bills. Senator Tremblay is quite right that Bill C-84 was referred to us in the middle of September 1987. As you know, prior to that Bill C-55 had been tabled and studied in the other House, but it was not referred to us at that time.

We proceeded with Bill C-84 on the understanding that this was the bill that constituted the emergency. We dealt with that bill and passed it, with amendments, on December 15, 1987. After the House and the Senate reconvened in January the bill was returned to us. We have had a few hearings on Bill C-84 with respect to our amendments and the minister's response to them.

It is true that one would have wished to have been able to deal with that more expeditiously than we did, but while we were waiting for Bill C-84 to return we had started our study of Bill C-55, which we had put aside.

Since reconvening in the latter part of January we have dealt primarily with Bill C-55, interspersing it with hearings with respect to Bill C-84. We have listened to a total of 47 different witnesses—that consists of groups and not only individuals. There were over 102 individual witnesses with respect to Bill C-55. I have to tell you that we had a great many more requests than we could possibly deal with, and that is why we tried to deal with them in groups. If we had tried to deal with all the witnesses, we would have had well over 200 witnesses. We had to take some time to put these groups together and try to get a common expression of opinion.

At the moment we are preparing our report on Bill C-84. I have every hope that we can get it back into the Senate by Thursday, March 31. We have had two meetings with our staff and legal counsel, and I believe that that is the best we can hope for. We have been sitting during adjournments of the Senate, and we intend to come back on Monday, March 28. However, there have been problems with translators and being able to get the committee together at various times to approve what we are doing.

We can certainly hope to have Bill C-84 back here on March 31. As far as Bill C-55 is concerned, we have concluded our hearings as of this morning, having heard from Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the chairman designate of the proposed Immigration and Refugee Board. We are making arrangements to hear from the minister sometime soon.

If we are able to dispose of Bill C-84 more quickly than we anticipate, perhaps we can hear from the minister next week. However, I would not anticipate that we would be able to report on Bill C-55 prior to the Easter break. I may advise my committee—and I believe they already know—that I would anticipate we will be coming back for one or two days in the second week of the Senate adjournment to attempt to dispose of Bill C-55.

Senator Tremblay: Thank you very much.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer that I would like to report.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS—REACTION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this answer is in response to a question asked by Senator Grafstein and Senator Marsden on March 16, regarding Foreign Affairs—Senegal—Presidential Election—Safety of Opposition Candidate.

It is a two-page answer, and I ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Maître Wade (and 12 other persons) have been formally charged with compromising the internal security of the State under specific provisions of the existing criminal code (articles 86 and 98). The charges are related to their alleged involvement in the violent demonstrations which followed the announcement of the results of the Presidential and legislative elections (February 28). The opening date for the court hearings has not yet been set. It is up to the court to decide on this date. In the meantime, Maître Wade and the others remain in custody.

The opposition newspaper "Sub Hebdo" wrote on March 16 that, "Maître Ba has been named coordinator by Maître Wade of the group of lawyers (24 Senegalese lawyers for the time being, others from overseas are expected to join in) who will defend the 13 persons charged before the 'cour de sûreté de l'État'".

The accused have requested special status (permitted under certain provisions) for the duration of their detention, i.e. a status which is different from that applied to regular detainees. The request is still pending, given procedural issues raised by both sides (i.e. the Interior Minister and the accused).

In the same article as quoted above, Maître Ba indicated that "the accused are in good health, physically and psychologically, and medical attention is being given when requested." Visits by relatives do take place. Visits by friends and supporters could also be permitted very shortly.

The safety of Maître Wade does not seem to be at stake.

It is now up to the court to decide whether Maître Wade did participate in the violent demonstrations in such a way as to compromise the internal security of the State of Sénégal. At least 24 Senegalese lawyers and possibly others from overseas will present a different case. In this regard, it should be mentioned that the 24 lawyers expressed their appreciation for the independence of the Senegalese tribunals which released, in the absence of sufficient evidence, the majority of the demonstrators who were arrested by the police.

Situation as at March 21, 1988.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-116, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, this bill just came to us today. Senator Doody told me that he had hoped that Senator Spivak, the spokesperson for the government on the bill, would be able to proceed today. I said that I thought that would be satisfactory. However, I said that I had hoped to contact Senator Marsden, our spokesperson, who is not in her place at the moment—and I am not sure if she will be attending today. I mention this only because, if she has to work from the record, rather than being present to enjoy hearing Senator Spivak, as the rest of us are, that may affect when she will be able to deal with it.

Senator MacDonald: You mean the nuance would be different from reading the transcript, senator?

Senator Frith: In the case of Senator Spivak, yes, senator; in your case, probably not!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to say that I appreciate the courtesy extended to us by the opposition in allowing us to start second reading on this bill. It would be better if Senator Marsden were here, but, unfortunately, as yet she has not been able to make it. Nevertheless, Senator Spivak will outline the importance of this particular legislation in the course of her remarks.

Senator Frith: Importance and urgency!

Senator Doody: Yes. I believe that honourable senators will share our concern in getting this bill started when they hear the message.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, Bill C-116 contains amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which are designed, in special circumstances, to make the application of unemployment insurance—and particularly the special benefits—more equitable.

This bill will extend benefits to fathers who, because of tragic circumstances beyond their control, become the primary caregivers to a newborn baby. It will also allow mothers, who are separated from their newborn baby due to the hospitalization of that baby, to take their maternity benefits when the baby comes home from the hospital.

• (1420)

These amendments are also designed to bring more flexibility to the Unemployment Insurance Act and, in so doing, will provide benefits to people like John McInnis, who was certainly a catalytic agent in the genesis of this legislation. As you may recall, honourable senators, Mr. McInnis' wife died following the birth of their daughter. He not only had to cope with the death of his wife and the new responsibilities of parenting, he also had to leave his job in order to care for his newborn child. To compound his problems, he was unable to collect UI benefits. He was denied those benefits because he was not available for work, and, although he had applied for Unemployment Insurance Adoption Benefits, he was denied these also, because he was the natural father. Mr. McInnis saw the minister in February, and this legislation is, in part, the result of that meeting. The legislation before us today will make Mr. McInnis and other fathers who find themselves in a similar situation eligible for UI benefits.

Specifically, the bill will bring into effect the following changes: In a situation where the mother dies and the father becomes the primary caregiver for the baby, the father would be eligible for up to 15 weeks of Unemployment Insurance Special Benefits provided all the normal qualifying conditions are met; other circumstances such as serious illness may create a similar dilemma—in other words, disability of the mother to such a degree that she cannot care for the baby. In such a situation, if the mother is already receiving sickness or maternity benefits, these benefits would continue as they do under the current Unemployment Insurance Act.

However, if the mother is not entitled to receive Unemployment Insurance benefits, and provided normal qualifying conditions are met, the father would be eligible for up to 15 weeks of benefits.

In both cases these benefits will be payable only to the father. The term "father" is defined as not only the biological father but also the man who stands in the position of the child's father in the eyes of the community.

These changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, of course, would also apply to people claiming Unemployment Insurance Adoption Benefits in exactly the same way and with the same qualifying conditions.

Bill C-116 also addresses another inflexibility in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It will allow for the payment of maternity or adoption benefits from the time a baby comes home from the hospital. This change would allow mothers of babies born prematurely, or hospitalized for other reasons after birth, to take the balance of their maternity benefits when the baby comes home from the hospital. The maternal period, as it is called, is extended one week for every week that the baby is hospitalized.

While these amendments introduced here today address specific sets of circumstances, a number of questions related to the broader issue of paternal benefits remain: issues such as the apparent difference in the qualifying period between regular employment benefits and special benefits; the time of payment of special benefits, now limited to the initial phase; the maximum amount of maternity and/or parental benefits available, et cetera. These questions, as I understand it, are being examined carefully by the department now.

Honourable senators, Bill C-116 will be retroactive to one year from its date of proclamation. A retroactivity period of one year was selected in order to be as generous as possible and cover cases where these changes are relevant. Quick action on the measures before us is being asked for by the minister, since it is felt most important that the legislative inflexibility which denied someone like John McInnis benefits should be corrected. These amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are one important step in the evolution of an equitable benefits system, and I hope that they will be supported in this chamber.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-51—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-51, An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I thought that Senator Olson made some very interesting points yesterday, of which we should all take heed, when he challenged Senator Cogger to speak to an order that was dated March 1. Then we went on to the third order, which is in the name of Senator Stewart, and which has been on the order paper since February 4. Then we had another situation.

In any event, with respect to Order No. 18, possibly the Deputy Leader of the Opposition could give us some indication of when Senator MacEachen proposes to speak to this matter, which has been on the order paper since October 1 of last year. Those of us who are on committees that do not meet in the summertime will have no problem with this order; it is only those of us who are on committees such as Transport and Communications and Banking, Trade and Commerce who may be looking for some time off who might find this situation a little bit shaky. Since Senator Olson has brought up what I think is a very good point, possibly Senator Frith could indicate when his leader will get into the mood to get around to this order, which has been standing on the order paper for a heck of a lot longer than the two orders mentioned by Senator Olson yesterday.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator MacDonald if he is now in a position to advise the house on whether or not Senator Cogger intends to take his advice.

Hon. Michel Cogger: As I indicated to Senator Olson yesterday, I intend to give Bill S-15 the same amount of undivided, non-partisan and profound attention that Bill C-22 received.

Senator MacDonald: Meditation.

Senator Cogger: Yes, meditation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator MacDonald has suggested that possibly I could explain when Senator MacEachen will proceed with Order No. 18. He is quite right, possibly I could, but, in fact, I am not going to. However, I can recognize circumstances under which we might all try to give explanations on our own behalf or on behalf of absent colleagues with respect to every order that stands. I do not understand why he has particularly picked out Order No. 18. Certainly, this question of standing orders, when our order paper is as full as it is now, is something that I think all honourable senators have been thinking about. As a matter of fact, one aspect of this, the reprinting costs involved, has been considered by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. And it was considered by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders this morning. The general concern Senator MacDonald has expressed is well founded, and we are concerned about it and the committees are taking it into account.

● (1430)

As to the question of "shakes" and the summer, I do not quite get the relevance of that to Order No. 18.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Frith has always been a role model to me. I am sure it has been his experience in the past, as it has been that of others who have been off cigarettes for the last few months, that we tend to become more shaky every day, and anything that involves the tobacco industry is a matter of concern.

Senator Doody: So that is your role model. No wonder you are shaky!

Senator MacDonald: We gave up smoking in committees as a result of Senator Frith's interventions. I do not think this is a frivolous matter to bring up. We seem to be facing the kinds of threats that we usually do at this time of the year, with a lot on our plates and a lot coming before us. I just do not understand why these orders keep going on and on. I recently withdrew an inquiry, because I thought it would have been scandalous to leave it on the order paper for more than a number of months.

Senator Frith: So did I.

Senator Doody: You got unanimous consent.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Olson brings up matters which have been on the order paper for a matter of days or weeks. I was particularly enthusiastic to hear Senator Stewart, because the item on which he is to speak is a subject in which I happen to have a particular interest. It has only been on the order paper a short time. Senator Olson raised this matter, and I think he is right. Senator Cogger has a responsibility, as does Senator MacEachen. This item has been on the order paper since Moses was a pup, that is, since October of last year. That is shocking! How long do we have to wait?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I, as well as other senators, have observed Senator MacDonald very closely and I only hope that, since he says that I am his role model, some colleague of mine will assure me that he has been unsuccessful in emulating that role model!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would just like to say a word about the inquiry which stands in my name, and which has now been on our order paper for over a year.

Senator Frith: What number is that?

Senator Fairbairn: I believe it is Order No. 13, which deals with the question of illiteracy in Canada. It was my hope that a great number of senators would take part in this debate, and it certainly is my intention to keep this inquiry on the order paper just as long as it takes to eradicate the problem.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: That is setting a role model for Senator Cogger.

Order stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

MEECH LAKE COMMUNIQUÉ—AGENDA FOR SENATE REFORM—
ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That it is timely for the Senate of Canada to take into consideration the agenda set out in the Meech Lake communiqué on the subject of Senate Reform including the following:

- the functions and role of the Senate;
- the powers of the Senate;
- the method of selection of Senators; and
- the distribution of Senate seats.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, Order No. 27 has been on the order paper for a long time. The reason I stood this order was because I happened to be acting whip at the time. I could take it off today, but, in view of what has been said before, I will leave it on.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: May I observe, honourable senators, that every single order that has been called and stood since Order of the Day No. 18, which was the subject of our original discussion, has been on the order paper since October 1987 or before that time.

Order stands.

THE SENATE

OTTAWA CITIZEN ARTICLE OF NOVEMBER 18, 1986—INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiry No. 2:

By the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to an article dated November 18, 1986, in the Ottawa Citizen, which in its imputations holds in contempt not only an institution of Parliament, but by extension all of its Members, and goes beyond the guarantees of freedom of expression under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on a point of order, last week I raised the matter of Inquiry No. 1 having been on the order paper for 16 months—that is, the inquiry has yet to be introduced and debated. I thought that Senator De Bané gave us very good reasons why we should now take it off the order paper; but, as one who believes in freedom of speech, I suppose that we can let it remain for a further period.

My question on the point of order concerns Inquiry No. 2, which stands in the name of Senator Marshall. It has been on the order paper since December 1986—that is, for the past 15 months. Senator Marshall has yet to launch that debate. Has he any good reason for not launching it at this time?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, there is no one I respect more than Senator Corbin through our relationship on committees and on other matters, and we agree on most of them. However, in this case all I can say is that I have reasons of strategy for leaving this inquiry on the order paper. If I disclose that strategy, the person to whom I am directing the inquiry will be aware of what I am trying to do; and I would not want that to happen.

An Hon. Senator: Let him stew for a while!

Senator Corbin: I accept that explanation.

Inquiry stands.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

FIFTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING HELD IN BANFF, ALBERTA—INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiry No. 4:

By the Honourable Senator Macquarrie:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary association held in Banff, Alberta, from 21st to 25th September, 1987.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before this continuing point of order—which actually is a group confession, it seems to me—is directed to my inquiry, which in comparison with some is a mere adolescent, I want to say that I do not feel at all guilty, although I am a Calvinist. I think it is an excellent idea to have these things on the order paper. It demonstrates to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who read our documents that the Senate encompasses a wide range of interests. We would not want to be a narrow group of privileged people who care only about a few things.

Also, I want a little more time to fructify my thoughts, to polish my phrases, so they will be fit and suitable for the audience I expect to have when I deliver them. Long ago, God knows, when I was a little boy, my father taught me that those things which are of great value are worth waiting a good deal of time for.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 29, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 2930)

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

THURSDAY, March 24, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 11th February 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments and observations:

1. Page 2, clause 2: Strike out lines 18 to 28.
2. Page 23, clause 26: Strike out lines 1 to 3 and substitute the following:

"26.(1) Sections 12, 13, 15, 17, 20 and 25 shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation.

26.(2) Sections 50.1 to 50.6 of the Copyright Act, and the headings in relation thereto, as enacted by section 14 of this Act, shall come into force on the day that is one year after the day they are assented to or on such later day as may be fixed by proclamation.

26.(3) Section 50.7 of the Copyright Act, and the heading immediately preceding that section, as enacted by section 14 of this Act, shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation."

PURPOSE OF BILL C-60

The purpose of this Bill is to amend the Copyright Act and in consequence the Competition Act, the Access to Information Act, the Industrial Design Act and the Privacy Act.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Copyright is "the legal recognition of the exclusive right of a creator to determine the use of a work and to share in the benefits produced by that use."

(Canada, Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, From Gutenberg to Telidon, A White Paper on Copyright, Supply and Services, 1984.) In Canada, this legal recognition is provided through the Copyright Act, a statute which remains substantially the same as when it was proclaimed in 1924. Since that time, technology has changed dramatically, increasing the number of ways in which the results of artistic endeavour may be exploited. The Copyright Act has proved remarkably adaptable to the new technology considering that its framers could hardly have foreseen the advent of such inventions as television, photocopiers, video tape recorders, computers and other devices. Nevertheless, as far back as 1957 when the Ilsley Royal Commission reported on copyright reform, the Canadian government has recognized that the Copyright Act was in need of revision. Subsequent reports were issued by the Economic Council in 1971, by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in 1976 (the Keyes/Brunet report), the white paper on copyright reform in 1984 (From Gutenberg to Telidon), and the report by the Subcommittee on the Revision of Copyright of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture in 1985 (A Charter of Rights for Creators). In addition to these comprehensive studies on copyright reform, specific aspects of copyright have been examined by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and proposals for change were made in 1982 by the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee (the Applebaum/Hébert committee), and in 1986 by the Task Force on Broadcasting Policy (the Caplan/Sauvageau task force).

In February 1986, the Government responded to the report of the Subcommittee on the Revision of Copyright endorsing the approach taken by the subcommittee and agreeing with most of its recommendations. On 27th May 1987, Bill C-60 was introduced by the Government and read the first time. Second reading was given on 26th June 1987 at which time the Bill was referred to a legislative committee. The Bill was passed by the House of Commons on 3rd February 1988 and was sent to the Senate.

AN OVERVIEW OF BILL C-60

Bill C-60 represents the first stage in the Government's proposed comprehensive revision of the Copyright Act, containing approximately 25 percent of the recommendations made in the 1985 Report of the Subcommittee on the Revision of Copyright entitled A Charter of Rights for Creators. There are nine main issues addressed in Bill C-60. These are the following:

1. Exhibition Rights - introduces a new right providing the holder with the sole right to present artistic works at public exhibitions.
2. Moral Rights - expands existing moral rights and defines the nature of an infringement.

3. Compulsory Licences - abolishes the compulsory licensing of sound recordings at the rate of 2¢ per side.
4. Collectives - provides the statutory foundation for the collective administration of all economic rights under copyright.
5. Copyright Board - reconstitutes the existing Copyright Appeal Board as the "Copyright Board" and expands its jurisdiction.
6. Choreographic Works - provides copyright protection for any choreographic work regardless of whether or not it has a story line.
7. Computer Software - explicitly extends copyright protection to computer software.
8. Copyright Infringement - substantially increases the penalties for infringement of copyright.
9. Industrial Design - clarifies the relationship between industrial design and copyright protection.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce heard evidence touching on each of these issues and while it supports the overall thrust of Bill C-60, including many of its key provisions, there are other aspects of the Bill and of the legislative process which the Committee finds troubling.

Copyright Protection for Computer Software

In testimony before the Committee, representatives from the Information Technology Association of Canada (ITAC) emphasized their strong support for Bill C-60, which explicitly extends copyright protection to software by re-defining "literary work" to include computer programs. The Bill also considerably strengthens the penalties for commercial infringement of copyright. Members of ITAC stated that without Bill C-60, owners or creators of software were not assured of protection for their products under Canadian law. According to ITAC, illegal copying of software costs the Canadian industry approximately $400 million annually and an estimated 8,000 jobs. Further, if Bill C-60 does not pass, Canadian entrepreneurs who develop software are likely to suffer greater hardship as a result of software piracy than the multinationals which are able to fight back through the courts. ITAC urged the Committee to move for swift passage of Bill C-60 because,

"We desperately need the legal certainty that Bill C-60 will bring for software." (53:34)

This Committee is aware of the importance of the information technology industry to Canada's economy and of the need to provide copyright protection for computer software which is the fastest growing sector of that industry. We support the provisions of Bill C-60 extending copyright protection to the Canadian software industry.

Exhibition Rights

Some of the strongest objections by witnesses were made over the introduction of an exhibition right for artistic works under the Copyright Act. Representatives from the Canadian Museums' Association and the Canadian Art Museum Directors' Organization both stated that they support the principle that artists receive compensation for the public exhibition of their works. Indeed, according to the Canadian Museums' Association brief, 95 percent of museums have voluntarily paid fees to artists for the public exhibition of their works that are on loan. However, in the opinion of the Canadian Museums' Association, entrenching an exhibition right in the legislation is likely to have serious consequences for the art market and for the public display of art. The Association further noted that the introduction of exhibition rights was predicated on the view put forward by the report "A Charter of Rights for Creators" that there is a consensus in the art community in support of such a right. The museum representatives made it clear that no such consensus existed. In fact, neither curators nor museum representatives appeared before the House of Commons Subcommittee on the Revision of Copyright.

Museum representatives outlined several problems likely to arise as a result of the introduction of an exhibition right. Mr. Duncan Cameron, President of the Canadian Art Museum Directors' Organization, stated that determining and locating the holder of the copyright could create an onerous administrative burden for exhibitors. Further, if the holder of copyright can determine whether or not a work of art may be exhibited, he or she may also determine when, where and in what context the work is exhibited. Copyright holders (who are not necessarily the artists) will thus be provided with the power of censorship over art works which they do not own. The rights of the public to view certain works of art may be impaired if the exhibition right is exercised in a censorious or capricious manner. Ms. Barbara Tyler, President of the Canadian Museums' Association stated that it would "not make sense" to acquire for a collection works of art that did not carry with them the exhibition rights.

The Joint Copyright Legislative Committee of the Canadian Bar Association and the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada testified that they took no position with respect to clause 2 which implements exhibition rights. However, they noted that there were "certain difficulties with the clause." (53:50)

On the other hand, groups representing artists indicated that while they support the introduction of an exhibition right, they feel that it does not go far enough. The Canadian Conference of the Arts stated their desire to see the exhibition right extended to include all works of art regardless of whether they were created before or after the coming into force of Bill C-60.

Perhaps the most surprising evidence received by this Committee was in relation to an agreement amongst representatives of the visual arts community producing a compromise on the issue of exhibition rights. The 22nd February 1988 meeting at which the agreement was reached was attended by the following organizations: the Canadian Artists' Representation (CARFAC), Vis-Art Copyright Inc., the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts (RCAA), the Association of National Non-Profit Artist Run Centres (ANNPAC), the Canadian Museums' Association, the Canadian Art Museum Directors' Organization (CAMDO) and the Professional Art Dealers Association of Canada (PADAC). The terms of the agreement involved an extension of the exhibition right to works created before the coming into force of Bill C-60, on the one hand, while limiting the application of the right "to works that are not owned by a museum and presented by that museum at a public exhibition", on the other. Thus museums' permanent collections would be exempt under the agreement while all other copyright works, whenever created, would be subject to the exhibition right. Representatives from the Canadian Conference of the Arts stated that irrespective of the agreement, they wished to see Bill C-60 enacted in its current form. Ms. Barbara Tyler, President of the Canadian Museums' Association, stated that it was her understanding that the agreement was to be put before this Committee in the form of an amendment to clause 2 of Bill C-60. Ms. Tyler declared that as far as her organization was concerned, if the Bill were not amended as agreed, there was no deal with respect to exhibition rights.

While the Committee is sensitive to the right of artists to receive fair and adequate compensation for their work, it feels that establishment of an exhibition right might not help in achieving this goal. Evidence indicated that knowledgeable art buyers are not likely to purchase works without the exhibition rights included. Further, it is uncertain whether assignment of exhibition rights will permit all artists to demand a premium over the current price they receive for their works. Compared with the present situation, transfer by the artist of the exhibition right may not enhance the value of an artwork to a collector except to the extent that he or she does not feel obliged to pay exhibition fees previously remitted voluntarily. At the same time, the Committee does not hold the extreme view taken by one witness that the introduction of an exhibition right could destroy the market for artists' works. The same witness pointed out that the exhibition right is likely to be nullified by an assignment in every transaction. While the introduction of this right may not have a significant impact on large art buyers, it could result in the acquisition of art works by less informed private collectors without a proper determination of the attendant rights.

The evidence heard by this Committee indicates that exhibition rights remain a controversial matter in the art community. Indeed, aside from the aborted agreement between artists and museum representatives, there has not been a consensus on the matter. Visual artists' representatives suggested that, despite their desire to change clause 2 in the second stage of copyright revision, the Bill should be passed in its present form. Representatives from the museums stated that their support for the agreement reached with respect to clause 2 was conditional on the Bill being amended as agreed, otherwise clause 2 should be eliminated.

Since the exhibition right would affect not only museums and galleries, but also schools of art, universities, and any other place where artistic works are publicly displayed, this provision would have wide application. Furthermore, the definition of "artistic work" (clause 1 (1)) and the meaning of the term "public exhibition" are contentious. The Committee has learned that the Government intends to re-define the former term in the second stage of amendments to the Copyright Act. When she appeared before the Committee, the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Flora MacDonald, confirmed that work is already well advanced on a revised definition of "artistic work". As a revised definition and an agreed upon exhibition right are to be included in the next set of copyright amendments expected shortly, it would seem unwise to proceed with the introduction of an exhibition right at this time.

The Committee believes that the issue of exhibition rights should be dealt with in stage two of copyright revision. Therefore, it recommends that the provisions of Bill C-60 introducing exhibition rights be withdrawn by amending the Bill as follows:

COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT

The Copyright Act already provides for the collective exercise of the performing rights in musical works. Currently, there are two performing rights societies in Canada, the Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada (CAPAC) and the Performing Rights Organization of Canada (PRO CAN, formerly BMI Canada), both of which have been in operation for more than 40 years licensing the right to broadcast or publicly perform musical works. Other copyright collectives such as the Union des écrivains du Québec (Quebec Writers' Union), Vis-Art Copyright Inc., and La Société pour l'avancement des droits en audio-visuel (SADA) have been established to administer other copyright rights.

At the present time, formation of collectives not sanctioned by law is discouraged by the provisions of the Competition Act. However, Bill C-60 provides that new collectives may negotiate agreement on their rates with users and will be exempt from section 32 of the Competition Act on condition that they file the agreement with the Copyright Board.

A number of witnesses expressed resistance to the implementation of further collective administration of copyright at this time. In many cases this appeared to stem from the uncertainty associated with the new system. The degree of uncertainty and apprehension has been heightened by the Government's decision to proceed with copyright revision in two stages. Submissions from educational users such as the Canadian Teachers' Federation, while generally endorsing the idea of collectives, were concerned that adequate funding be made available to meet the projected increase in expenditures on copyright material.

Another concern was that the number of collectives be kept to a minimum in order that negotiating and transaction costs be minimized. Other witnesses pointed out that negotiations between collectives and the educational institutions were likely to be carried out at the ministry level, relieving individual schools from any negotiating burden. However, since the provincial ministers of education did not appear before the Committee, we are unable to confirm that negotiations with the collectives will be concluded at the ministry level. Even if this were the case, such negotiations would fail to cover other educational institutions not within the ministers' responsibility. In a communiqué dated 26th February 1988, the Council of Ministers of Education stated that the Parliament of Canada should postpone the enactment of Bill C-60 until the more "substantive" elements of copyright reform are known.

Witnesses from the educational community suggested that there should be provision in the legislation to allow educators to use works not covered by a collective copyright licence. Otherwise, teachers would be subject to lawsuits from "maverick" authors or artists who do not belong to any collective. In its submission, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), was particularly concerned that the works of all authors be available for study and research. According to the AUCC, it would not be realistic to expect certain works such as correspondence, notes, diaries, lectures, etc. which were not created for commercial gain, to be licensed through collectives. The Committee is sympathetic to the argument put forward by educators that students be allowed access to the broadest range of information without putting educators in legal jeopardy.

Therefore, the Committee recommends that the Government and representatives from the educational community immediately begin consultations designed to ensure that educators enjoy access to material not included in the repertoire of the collectives.

EXEMPTIONS FROM COPYRIGHT

The overwhelming weight of evidence from copyright users dealt with the Government's decision to implement copyright revision in two stages. One submission compared evaluating copyright reform at this stage to providing an opinion on a meal after having consumed only the appetizer. The criticism heard from representatives of educational institutions, libraries and broadcasters centered primarily on the lack of provision in Bill C-60 for further exemptions from copyright and on the absence of a definition of what constitutes "fair dealing" under the Act.

Fair dealing presently lacks a statutory definition. The Copyright Act simply states that the following Acts do not constitute an infringement of copyright: "a) any fair dealing with any work for the purposes of private study, research, criticism, review, or newspaper summary." (R.S.C. 1970, c.C-30, s. 17(2)(a))

According to evidence received by the Committee, the courts have given a narrow interpretation to "fair dealing" by ruling that it does not extend to copies of complete works.

Representatives from the Canadian Association of Broadcasters stated that the definition of "fair use" (fair dealing) should be expanded to include "incidental use" of protected material such as when background music is played at a televised sporting event. What broadcasters are really seeking, however, is the right to make reproductions of performances for later broadcast (an exemption for ephemeral recordings). The current provisions of the Copyright Act have been interpreted to require a broadcaster to obtain a clearance from the rights holder before making such a reproduction. According to broadcasters, such an exemption would be needed in light of the decision of the Federal Court of Canada in the case of Bishop v. Télé-Métropole, involving the copying of a performance of a song for broadcast at a future time. Application for leave to appeal this decision to the Supreme Court of Canada is pending. Unless the Federal Court's decision is overturned, broadcasters fear that they will have to pay composers large fees for reproduction of their works or face the stiff penalties for commercial piracy imposed under Bill C-60.

The Canadian Musical Reproduction Rights Agency Limited (CMRRA), which brought the suit against Télé-Métropole, stated that the broadcasters are merely attempting to obtain an exemption from the requirement to obtain synchronization licences. According to CMRRA, these licences are a standard practice around the world. The CMRRA has indicated its willingness to negotiate some form of ephemeral recording exemption for broadcasters.

Representatives from the Canadian Teachers' Federation noted that the U.S. Copyright legislation provides an exemption for use of copyright material within a classroom or educational setting. The Canadian Association of University Teachers believes that some uses of copyright material, such as for examination purposes, should be exempted from copyright. However, witnesses from the Canadian educational community were still unaware whether such exemptions would be provided in stage two of copyright revision.

Representatives from the Canadian Library Association also indicated that they remain unenlightened concerning the specific library/archival exemptions that the Government intends to introduce in stage two.

Officials from the Department of Communications acknowledged that provision for fair dealing and exemptions would have to wait until the second stage of copyright revision. They maintained, however, that pending the arrival of stage two, the position of users would not worsen. From the user's standpoint, though, the advent of copyright collectives provided for in Bill C-60 would change their circumstances considerably. In order to maintain access to copyright material, educational institutions and libraries would be required to acquire a licence and negotiate a fee with a reprography collective, for instance. However, without a definition of fair dealing and knowledge of what exemptions will be provided in stage two, users will be handicapped in negotiating equitable fees.

Despite provision for a newly reconstituted Copyright Appeal Board (renamed the Copyright Board) which would be empowered to make a fee determination where a licensing body and a user fail to reach agreement, user groups appearing before the Committee were apprehensive about the prospect of dealing with the monopolistic collectives. As Ms. Lorraine Flaherty from the Canadian School Trustees' Association stated before this Committee: "We know very clearly that once Bill C-60 is passed, the collectives will be ready to start negotiations. In addition to not knowing where those negotiations will take place, we feel we are at a terrible disadvantage in not even knowing what it is we are negotiating." (54:38)

In the Committee's view, an arbitral tribunal such as the Copyright Board is a necessary and valuable counter-balance to the power of the collectives. However, another type of check on this power is legislative exemption which would limit the collectives' mandate and provide users with explicit rules as to what does and does not constitute copyright infringement.

In testimony before the Committee, witnesses representing the Social Science Federation of Canada, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the Canadian Library Association, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Canadian School Trustees' Association, the Ontario School Trustees' Council, and the Ontario

Teachers' Federation, advocated that the clause of Bill C-60 dealing with the collective administration of copyright not be proclaimed until the second stage of copyright amendments are complete. Thus exemptions from copyright would come into effect simultaneously with the statutory foundation for the establishment of collectives. As the Canadian Library Association stated, "In that environment, we feel we can be partners in negotiations with the collectives." (54:20)

The Committee agrees that copyright users should be permitted to negotiate with the collectives on a level playing field. In our view, this can only be accomplished by postponing the clause of Bill C-60 providing the statutory foundation for the establishment of collectives. While the Minister has assured the Committee that stage two is imminent, no firm date was provided for the introduction of the next phase of amendments. Absent a specific date on which to fix implementation of the provisions of clause 14 dealing with collectives, the Committee believes that the coming into force of these provisions should be postponed for at least one year to provide a reasonable period of time for the Government to determine what exemptions are to be granted to users. Therefore, the Committee recommends the following amendment:

Page 23, clause 26: Strike out lines 1 to 3 and substitute the following:

"26.(1) Sections 12, 13, 15, 17, 20 and 25 shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation.

26.(2) Sections 50.1 to 50.6 of the Copyright Act, and the headings in relation thereto, as enacted by section 14 of this Act, shall come into force on the day that is one year after the day they are assented to or on such later day as may be fixed by proclamation.

26.(3) Section 50.7 of the Copyright Act, and the heading immediately preceding that section, as enacted by section 14 of this Act, shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation."

Explanatory Note

This amendment would divide clause 26 into three subclauses.

Subclause 26(1) would remove clause 14 from the general proclamation provisions. It would also amend clause 26 to refer to "a day or days" to be fixed by proclamation rather than "a day" as clause 26 currently provides. In itself, this amendment would give the Government more flexibility in proclaiming certain provisions of the Bill into force.

Subclause 26(2) would prevent sections 50.1 to 50.6 of clause 14 from being proclaimed into force for at least one year after Bill C-60 receives Royal Assent. By imposing such a delay, this amendment would make possible the enactment of specific exemptions for certain categories of users under the Copyright Act before those sections of clause 14 respecting the collective administration of copyright, on the one hand, and the examination of agreements, on the other, could be proclaimed into force.

This amendment would not compel the enactment of any exemptions; nor would it make the coming into force of sections 50.1 to 50.6 of clause 14 conditional upon the passage of such exemptions. However, by preventing their coming into force for at least one year, it would provide a reasonable period of time within which to enact the relevant exemptions, thus enabling the law contemporaneously to strike an equitable balance between the interests of both creators and users alike.

Subclause 26(3) would provide for the coming into force of section 50.7 of clause 14 on a day to be fixed by proclamation. This section sets out a licensing mechanism in the case of an unlocatable copyright owner. Because it is totally unrelated to the other sections under clause 14 respecting the collective administration of copyright and the examination of agreements, there is no reason to postpone its coming into force, as is being recommended under subclause 26(2) in relation to the measures on collectives. Consequently, this amendment, together with the amendment under subclause 26(2), would divide clause 14 of the Bill into two parts and it would enable section 50.7 to come into force on proclamation, as is currently provided under clause 26 of the Bill.

The Copyright Board

Copyright lawyer Ms. Gloria Epstein, in testimony before the Committee, criticized the lack of guidance provided in Bill C-60 to the Copyright Board. In this respect, she raised two issues: first, how the Board determines a fair tariff; second, determining who has the burden of proof in suggesting what tariffs might be fair in situations where the Board is called upon to arbitrate. The witness noted that under the current regime, the interested parties make numerous appearances before the Copyright Appeal Board, and motions and appeals to the Federal Court. It was suggested by the witness that measures be added to Bill C-60 providing some guidance to the Copyright Board. Professor Dennis Magnusson from the Social Science Federation of Canada also stated his belief that the Board should be given at least limited legislative direction to ensure a fair balance is attained between users' access to works and creators' need for compensation.

Evidence to the contrary was received from the Canadian Bar Association, which stated that the tribunal did not need further definition since it could be relied upon "to exercise its common sense and operate on a reasonable basis." (53:55)

When she appeared before the Committee, the Minister of Communications was of the opinion that the Copyright Board has the power to promulgate its own regulations with respect to determining certain matters, including which party in a dispute before the Board has the onus of proof. If this is the case, the Committee does not see any need to set out in the legislation further guidelines for the operation of the Board. On the other hand, if it transpires that the Board does not have this power, the Committee believes that the Government should give consideration to providing in the legislation the necessary guidelines for the Board's smooth operation.

CONCLUSION

The Committee would like to reiterate its support for the broad thrust of Bill C-60 which is certainly responsive to the creators' need for legal protection of the fruits of their efforts. At the same time, it is necessary that the rights of users also be adequately protected and thus a balance maintained. The amendments suggested in this report seek to engineer such a balance between creator and user needs while keeping alterations to the proposed legislation at a minimum.

Some groups which came before the Committee suggested that they had already waited too long for this legislation and they urged that Bill C-60 be passed by the Senate regardless of flaws. As representatives from the Canadian Bar Association and the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada stated: "In our view, any deficiencies in the Bill do not warrant further delay of its passage . . . To permit any further delay in the progress of Bill C-60 may jeopardize the passage of the Bill and leave the major problems which the Bill addresses still unresolved." (53:48)

Other witnesses had a different view. As one of them said: "What is the point of having these hearings before the Senate if, although the Senate may recognize problems, it will pass the Bill anyway? . . . This Senate committee has to have some purpose behind it. If the committee sees problems, in my submission, the legislation should be sent back with recommendations for amendment." (54:78)

This Committee subscribes to the latter view of its role in the legislative process.

Dissenting Opinions

Members of the Committee who support the Government, although concerned about the two-stage approach to copyright reform, do not approve of the aforementioned amendments.

This report represents the views of a majority of the Committee. The members who support the Government are in disagreement with the report.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 29, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 6, 1987-88

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-119, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1988.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am at a disadvantage. Obviously, my counterparts are detained somewhere. Earlier today we had discussions with Senator Frith, and the indications were that it would be permissible to proceed with second reading of this bill later this day. However, if it is the desire of the Senate that we stand it until Senator Frith or Senator MacEachen arrives, that is fine.

Senator Bonnell: Let us deal with it later this day.

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1988-89

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-120, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1989.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-52, respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, March 31, 1988.

ANIMAL PEDIGREE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-67, an Act respecting animal pedigree associations.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, March 31, 1988.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STUDY OF ELEMENTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND AGREED TEXTS—DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF REPORT EXTENDED

Hon. George van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 29, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on November 5, 1987, to examine and report upon elements of a Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States, tabled in the Senate on October 6, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-589), and texts subsequently agreed to, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its report be extended from 29 March, 1988, to no later than 31 March, 1989.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE C. VAN ROGGEN,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I wish to explain the reason for the extension of the date to March 31, 1989.

While the wording, of necessity, refers to the report not being brought in until that time, honourable senators should understand that the manner in which the committee is approaching this subject is that there are a number of reports within a report that we will probably be producing. We are now drafting a report on a constitutional aspect of this matter. We have taken a good deal of evidence on the energy sector; we have not yet started evidence on the agricultural sector, which is a large add-on to a normal free trade arrangement. Similarly, we would be approaching the financial services and services sector as a separate large subject—the first time that it has ever been attempted in a free trade agreement between two nations. There is then the Auto Pact, the dispute settling mechanism, and, in due course, the American legislation, to say nothing of the Canadian legislation. So I hope that we will be producing reports for the Senate in the interim, but, certainly, this whole process will take at least until next March, and maybe even after that.

So, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 29, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends the following:

1) Salary and Benefits Revision for Unrepresented Senate Employees on Fiscal year 1988-89

- a) The pay scales of unrepresented employees (except Senators' secretaries) be increased by 4% effective April 1, 1988.

b) Senators' secretaries pay scale be modified by adding an additional step at $32,616.

c) Senators' secretaries not at the maximum of the scale be entitled to a lump sum payment equivalent to 3.5% of their salary on April 1, 1988 and payable on a monthly basis. This will permit the maintenance of pay relativities between steps in the scale.

2) Taxi Regulations

a) That claims without receipts be increased to $18.

b) That there be no maximum limit for taxi claims since it is part of a Senator's travel entitlement to his or her residence or to Ottawa. Claims above $18 must be accompanied by a receipt.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave, I move the adoption of this report now, but before I ask that it be voted upon without adjournment I will explain it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this is a report of the committee dealing with the salary and benefit revisions for unrepresented Senate employees for the fiscal year 1988-89; that is, those employees not subject to statutory collective bargaining.

The second part of that report deals with an increase or a change in the taxi regulations to increase the amount that can be claimed without a receipt. It is based on recent increases in taxi rates.

Honourable senators, there are two ways we can proceed. If honourable senators wish to have a closer look at this report, which I received just a few moments ago, I can have copies distributed and adjourn the matter until later this day, or I can adjourn it until tomorrow. My preference is to distribute copies while the matter stands adjourned until later this day. If at that point honourable senators are not satisfied, then we can adjourn it further.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that is a very reasonable suggestion. I am one of those people who like to read the fine print before I vote on something. Therefore, I appreciate Senator Frith's consideration.

When Senator Frith speaks to the matter, perhaps he would tell us whether or not the changes in salaries have been included in the budget for the same fiscal year.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned until later this day.

PROBLEMS OF THE AGED

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, May 3, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the problems of the aged, including the substantial increase in population of those aged 65 and over as well as problems of income security, retirement, housing, transportation and social welfare in general, including abuse and health care.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-72—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d), I move:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Bill C-72, An Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto;

That the Bill be referred to the said special committee, in due course;

That, notwithstanding Rule 66(1)(b), the special committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bonnell, Cools, Cottreau, David, De Bané, Guay, Ottenheimer, Robichaud, Tremblay and Wood;

That the quorum of the special committee be four members; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if leave is not granted the motion will be placed on the order paper for Thursday next, March 31, 1988.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—STILL PHOTOGRAPHY POOL AUTHORIZED TO RECORD MARCH 31 PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

That a still photography pool be permitted to record the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech

[Senator Roblin.]

Lake Constitutional Accord on Thursday, March 31, 1988.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted, I shall explain why I am moving this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, last week I moved a similar motion for tomorrow, March 30, when Mr. Trudeau will be appearing before the committee. I do not know whether or not it appears in Hansard, but I recall Senator Flynn's asking why it was simply for March 30. To tell you the truth, I do not know why we made it simply for March 30, but we did. It was really a mistake in the wording. The motion ought not to have been limited to March 30. At the time I offered to amend the motion, but in the cross-talk we just did not get it done. However, there is no reason why, when we are going to have cameras, including the still camera pool, here for Mr. Trudeau on March 30, we should not also have them here for Senator Murray, who will be our only witness on Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to inform the house that Senator Murray will not be with us today. He is in the Maritimes on official business.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government. During the past three weeks I have raised a number of questions with the Leader of the Government, Senator Murray, who took the questions as notice and gave undertakings to provide answers to them. One such question was with regard to the new tar sands processing plant near Fort McMurray. Another particularly important question was with regard to the initial price paid by the Canadian Wheat Board for cereal grains this year, in view of the fact that the international market has recovered somewhat since prices were established one year ago.

Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government has delayed answers to these questions with him today, but, if not, perhaps we could have them prior to the adjournment this week, which adjournment will be, I think, until April 18. I would prefer his confirming that he will supply answers to these questions so that I will not need to ask these questions again tomorrow and the next day.

● (1420)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I had the answers I would be most pleased to deliver them. However, I do not, but I will undertake to try to provide them for Senator Olson just as quickly as they can be made available.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—PERCENTAGE OF ANGLOPHONES IN FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE IN QUEBEC

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, my question is really for the Leader of the Government. However, in his absence I should like to put it to the deputy leader. It deals with the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Before asking my question I would like to state that I support the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, and his 241-page annual report, notwithstanding that he had the "audacity" to use the word "humbling."

My question is: What is the federal government proposing to do about the deplorably low percentage of English-speaking Canadians working in federal government departments in the province of Quebec? In 1986 it was less than 5 per cent, and in the last annual report it is still less than 5 per cent. Again, there has been no change. Therefore, I ask what the federal government is proposing to do about this deplorable situation.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly attempt to get all the available information for Senator Wood at the earliest opportunity.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cogger, for the second reading of the Bill C-116, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.—
(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I was not present last Thursday to comment, from our side, on Bill C-116. Senator Spivak described the content and the advantages of this bill very well and fully.

For our part, we are in complete agreement with and support the changes contained in this legislation, including the retroactivity, which will ease the circumstances of parents in some, but certainly not all, situations in looking after newly-born or adopted children.

In this case, as honourable senators heard in Senator Spivak's speech last Thursday, the minister sponsoring this bill in the other place was responding to the very sad circumstances of Mr. McInnis, whose name will be familiar to senators from coverage by the media. Mrs. McInnis died shortly after childbirth and Mr. McInnis was unable to collect unemployment insurance benefits which would have allowed him to stay home to look after his child. The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 in Bill C-116 will change the circumstances for Mr. McInnis and, of course, for any other parent who finds himself in similar circumstances. It will also improve the situation of mothers whose babies, because of complications at childbirth, must stay in hospital longer than their mothers. Now those mothers will be able to claim unemployment insurance benefits within the 52-week period. We are in favour of both these changes to the legislation. They improve the flexibility considerably.

However, it is our position that the benefits announced in this bill should be only the first step toward the provision of real and complete parenting leave, allowing mothers full maternity leave, that is, either the current allowable time or longer allowable time with benefits, and allowing fathers parenting leave as well. Times have changed and both mothers and fathers now provide for the care of young children, and both mothers and fathers now have full-time, full-year work in the paid labour force.

In the case of adoption the initial period of entry of an adopted child into the family is a crucial and often difficult time which requires the involvement of both parents.

We commend the government for the provisions contained in this bill and urge them to bring in as full a parenting leave policy as possible for all Canadian families. Certainly, it will be our intention, as government, to give early and full attention to such a benefit.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is our hope to have this bill considered in Committee of the Whole this afternoon. The minister is trying to make himself available and, following Question Period in the House, if honourable senators are agreeable, we may be able to discuss this matter in Committee of the Whole. In the circumstances it may be advisable to stand this matter until later this day and then refer it to committee at that time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If debate on second reading is about to finish, why does not the Honourable Senator Spivak close the debate now and move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole later this day?

Senator Doody: I believe that Senator Spivak wishes to say something on this bill, so we should allow the sponsor to speak.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): If this bill is to be discussed in Committee of the Whole, do you think it would be all right if we asked the minister about Bill C-84 also?

Senator Doody: Far be it from me to suggest that I would put limitations on the questions that the honourable senator might feel called upon to raise in Committee of the Whole. I am sure that he is quite familiar with the proceedings, although I will admit that recently we have been branching out in new directions with Committee of the Whole in this place, in connection with which he, too, may admit to not having too much experience. However, I suspect that there will be no problems with the questions. As for the answers, that is something entirely different.

Hon. Mira Spivak: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Honourable senators, first, I wish to thank Senator Marsden for her support of the bill and for her remarks in this regard. I have just a few brief comments additional to those that I made in introducing the bill. I would first like to congratulate the minister for moving so expeditiously on these specific inequities with regard to unemployment insurance. I had congratulated Mr. McInnis, as the catalytic agent here, but I did not congratulate Cathy McLean from Nova Scotia and Melanie Williams of Vancouver, whose cases were the impetus for the amendments concerning premature babies, and the period in which benefits can apply.

There was one other aspect that I did not mention. In introducing these amendments the government has maintained the principle of the individual entitlement, not shared entitlement; that is, that the maternity benefits for the mother are protected. The bill protects the woman's right to use her entitlement to benefit. It protects that principle, and, in my view, that is very commendable and the right way to go.

• (1430)

As Senator Marsden pointed out, the bill addresses specific inequities. The first is the ability of the father, in circumstances where the mother has died or become disabled, to collect unemployment insurance benefits, provided he had a major attachment to the work force. This also applies to parents who have adopted children.

The second issue it addresses relates to premature babies that have to be left in the hospital for a longer period of time than is normal, and who need a mother's care when they leave the hospital. The mother will benefit from the flexibility in the legislation that enables unemployment insurance benefits to be paid until the mother returns to work.

I appreciate Senator Marsden's comments regarding the need for more comprehensive coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act for maternity and parental leave. I am aware, as is everyone else, that many reports have suggested a two-tier system of maternity and parental leave, which, again, would protect the mother's right to maternity leave, but which would expand parental leave. While this bill is not meant to address any of those issues, I have been told by officials in the department that many of the issues are being considered. It is my personal hope—although I am not expressing the government's position now—that, indeed, at some point in the future we will see that there is more comprehensive coverage; that is, the principle of child care provisions in the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is really established by this bill—

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Frith: Is or is not?

Senator Spivak: It is, because the bill recognizes the fact that there is a need for child care on the part of the parents, and these provisions will be expanded and will mean more comprehensive coverage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Committee of the Whole.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie moved the second reading of Bill C-102, to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act.
